THE BLUE ANCHOR.

CHAPTER I.

FOUNDERED.

The ship Griffin, a New Bedford vessel, bound from her last port, the Sandwich Islands, to the East Indies, thence to go home by way of Cape Hope, was bowling along through the Japan Sea at the rate of twelve knots. The wind being fair off her quarter, she had studdingsails set fore and aft, while far aloft her skysails swept the blue sky like the bosoms of white sea-birds.

Many of her crew-active fellows in dark-blue shirts and trowsers-were, on this day, at work in her rigging, with marlinspike and mallet, singing and whistling while they toiled. Watching them as they sat astraddle of the swaying yard-arm, or hung by long, pendant ropes, swinging to and fro like spiders, stood a lady, a passenger, upon the quarterdeck, holding in her arms an infant son, a chubby little fellow a year old. The lady was Mrs. Brandon, wife of a whaling-captain, with whom she had sailed from New Bedford, in the ship Rockland. Arrived at the Sandwich Islands, he had left her there, to remain until his return from the Arctic ocean. A few months after his departure, a northern whaler came into port, bringing Mrs. Brandon a letter from her husband, stating that he had been wrecked off the Aleuvan Islands, that he would have to wait there a long time before he could get his vessel off the rocks and repair damages. hat he would not think of ever trusting his wife and child o such a " patched " craft, and that she, with his little son. had therefore better take passage for home in the first good vessel leaving the Islands.

With many regrets, with a singular presentiment weighing upon her mind, Mrs. Brandon, as shown, had complied with the request Captain Blake, of the Griffin, being well acquainted with her husband, showed her every kind attention; but, while very glad to find herself so comfortably situated, she yet could not rid herself of that strange uneasiness which had followed her like a shadow ever since she quitted Honolulu.

No such shadow rested upon the spirits of little Wil., her infant son. He clapped his tiny hands merrily, and crowing with delight, sprung up and down in her arms, as if anxious of go to the men aloft. To sit thus upon his mother's arm, with the sunshine and blue water all around him, and a sugar-cake in one hand, was happiness enough for Master Will. Presently the cake dropped from his hand, and the mother was endeavoring to stoop to pick it up, when a bright-eyed lad, the cabin-boy, Harry Warlock, only ten years of age, came skipping along, and pushing a mass of dark-brown curls back from his brow, as he picked up the cake, put it in the little one's hands.

"That's a good boy," said Mrs. Brandon, kindly. "What is your name?"

"His name is Warlock, madam," said the captain, overhearing the remark, "and, young as he is, there is not a better sailor aboard this craft."

The lad colored modestly, and yet seemed pleased with the compliment. After he was gone, the captain went on to state that he was an orphan, the son of a deceased friend, and that he (the captain) had taken him to bring him up, and was determined to make a good sailor of him.

"I see," he added, putting his finger upon a BLUE ANCHOR, tattooed in India ink on little Will's left arm, "that my friend Brandon has commenced early to make a seaman of .his young chap."

Just as the skipper finished speaking, a noise like rattling thunder was heard through the whole ship. Blake, starting, glanced aloft, to see every stitch of canvas slatting as if ready to go to pieces! He sprung to the helm with an angry ejaculation, but soon discovered that what was taking place was no fault of the man at the wheel. In a word the wind, with suddenness truly appalling, had died away, there remained not a breath of air, and the sails, after a few useless struggles, bong motionless from the yards. At the same moment the first-mate, with white face, came running up from the cabin, stating that the barometer was falling with unusual rapidity!

Meanwhile, a stifling oppression seemed to fill the air, the men looked in each other's faces, with serious eyes and ominous shakes of the head, now and then glancing up at the cloudless sky, over which a thin haze, scarcely perceptible, floated like some stealthy phantom, creeping to pounce unswares upon the devoted ship.

East, west, north and south glanced the captain; then his voice rung through the vessel like the rattling of a chain-shot

"In with skysails, royals and stinsails! Stand by to clew up topsails!"

The men sprung to obey. The studdingsails were hauled in quickly, and active forms ran aloft, like squirrels, to fur' the lighter sails. Among them was little Warlock, who, young as he was, could "hand" (furl) a skysail or royal as well as any sailor in the ship.

"Bear a hand, there, aloft !" shrieked the captain, as an ominous buzzing, whizzing sound now became perceptible.

"Ay, ay!" was borne from the sunbrowned blue-jackets upon the yards.

At the same moment there was a rushing sound, like the flapping of unseen wings; then, ripping up the sea in millions of white furrows, down upon the devoted ship a shrieking, howling TYPHOON—a yelling, screaming, gurgling typhoon—came crashing like an avalanche charged with ten-fold thunders!

There was not a cloud in the sky, not a speck upon the sun's disc, yet, far along the sea, the spray was whirled, twisted and torn into fantastic shapes, and the vast ocean seemed to rise and bubble, to roar and hiss, as if huge monsters were fighting in its fathomless depths.

Tearing through the waters with humming keel, quivering masts, timbers creaking, groaning, as if a wedge were rending them asunder, away went the ship, speeding like a rocket. A cracking, snapping sound ran along the masts like an electric shock; the sheets parted, and the lighter canvas was in an instant torn to shreds.

Rolling and pitching violently, now lifted to the very heavens, then plunging bows and windlass under, the ship was hurled, driven onward like a mere chip before the shrieking tempest. Engulfed in volumes of water, which poured constantly over her as a cataract over a rock, the men on deck clinging to ropes and belaying-pins, dared not move a step lest they should be swept from their feet. The topsails, having been clewed up, many of the sailors were aloft, endeavoring to furl the canvas, but the sails, slatting about with a din like the rolling of whole platoons of musketry, knocked the men back as fast as they ventured upon the foot-rope. At length, some of the more daring, taking advantage of a heavy plunge of the vessel, causing the canvas to "belly in," threw themselves upon the foot-rope. As, half-blinded by the flying clouds of spray, they grasped the sail to draw it on the yard, the ship was tossed far up, the sail burst from the grasp of those who held it, parted both sheets, and flew straight up, then, with a report like thunder, came slatting down, beating the heads of the seamen until their senses nearly deserted them. One poor fellow, with a scream, was sent whirling, head downward, into the roaring, hissing pool of the stormy sea; the rest only escaped a similar fate by the tearing asunder of the huge topsail, which now went whirling straight up, far up, out of sight, in the seud and spray of the raging storm!

At the same moment a grinding, tearing noise was heard through every timber; then a sound, as if of men ripping up the planks!

Snap-er-r-rack! crack! cr-r-ash! and something dark flew before the eyes of the crew. Caught against the lee rigging, it was discovered to be a timber, which had been torn from the ribs of the poor ship, under the counter. Then a dismal gurgling prophesied the doom of the vessel—proclaimed that whole volumes of water were pouring into her hold!

"The boats, men, the BOATS!" howled the captain, in a piercing voice.

The first violence of the typhoon had by this time abated, but the sea was still heavy, and the wind still raged with terrific fury. The men now were busy, stowing provisions and breakers (small casks) of fresh water into the bosts.

Mrs. Brandon and child were on deck, carefully lashed to the mizzenmast, to prevent their going overboard.

The fair passenger trembled in every limb, and was very pale, but it was evident that all her fears were for her little boy, whom she had clasped tightly to her bosom. The gurgling of water, pouring into the hold, grew louder and louder; the ship lurched heavily—she must soon go down.

"Lower away!" shrieked the captain, and the boats, two in number, splashed alongside.

The skipper then took Mrs. Brandon by the hand, and was about helping her into the cutter, when a great sea came, dashing the boat against the side of the ship, and shivering it to pieces.

The other boat, filled with seamen, parting its warp, was at the same time whirled far to leeward.

But ten men, with little Warlock, the cabin-boy, were now left aboard the vessel, and these the captain at once set to work constructing a raft. The raft, put together with all possible dispatch, was launched alongside, containing what provisions and water the seamen had time to obtain.

The sailors, quickly springing upon it, stood ready to help Mrs. Brandon off the ship, as, with the child in her arms, she was conducted to the gangway. Just then, striking against the vessel with great violence, the hastily-constructed raft parted, leaving the seamen clinging to logs and timbers.

The captain, Mrs. Brandon and child, with little Warlock, now were the sole occupants of the vessel.

"We are lost! My child! my child! screamed Mrs. Brandon, as the ship's bows went up an instant, preparatory to making her last plunge.

The captain drew the woman to a spar, and lashed her to it, while little Warlock, who, throughout the storm, had displayed the coolness and courage of a veteran, performed the same service for her boy, whom he secured close to her side.

Having done this, the skipper and cabin-boy were about fistening themselves to the same piece of timber, when there was a prolonged bubbling, roaring noise—a heavy side-lurch of the doomed vessel, and then, lifting her stern an instant down she went, plunging out of sight forever. Amid the maddening whirl of waters, Captain Blake and his cabin-boy were

The two last they saw not again, but each clinging to his separate hold, finally sighted the boat which had drifted from the ship, and were picked up, to find those who had been carried away on the parted raft also aboard. Mrs. Brandon and her little son, however, had not been seen by the boatmen, who now, through a thick, foggy haze, which had settled upon the water, pulled hither and thither, vainly searching for the two castaways.

"Poor Brandon was very fond of his family," cried the captain, sorrowfully, "and a sad blow this will be to him. He has a little one year old daughter remaining to him, but she can never make up for the loss of his wife and child!"

On the next day the party in the boat were picked up by a wnaler, bound to the Sandwich Islands, where they arrived a month later.

CHAPTER II.

THE MEETING.

THE news of his wife and child's loss came to Brandon like a death-blow. The full particulars of the wreck were communicated to him by letter; but, not contented with this, he sought Captain Blake, hoping to hear something which might give him a vestige of hope.

But no; the captain firmly believed that the unfortunates were caught in the ship's rigging, and carried down with the vessel when she went under.

From that moment Brandon was a changed man. Pre viously a light-hearted, merry fellow, he now became gloomy and reserved; his once raven locks were streaked with gray, and he often fell into long reveries, from which even the duties of his calling were scarcely sufficient to rouse him. Returning home to his little daughter Mary, whom he had left in charge of a female friend, the playful ways of the child threw over his heart the first rays of sunshine he had felt since receiving the dark tidings. His whole existence now became bound up in this one child, who, as she grew up, realized all his fondest hopes.

Years rolled on, and she grew to womanhood; the sweet age of seventeen brought a deeper bloom to her check, a graver light to her soft, blue eyes. She was beautiful both in personelle and dispositon; she was the light and comfort of her father, who, within the past few years, had met with a review of misfortunes, which rendered her all the dearer to him.

In a word, Captain Brandon had suffered so many mishaps—had been lately wrecked and burned out so many times at sea, that he had carned, among superstitious sailors, the uncaviable reputation of a Jonah—that is a person said to bring all kinds of misfortunes to any craft aboard which he may ship.

Of course this was mere superstition, and there were many sea-cal tains and ship-owners in New Bedford who scoffed at the idea; still, as among every ship's crew there may be found men who firmly believe in this notion of a Jonah, Brandon had for a long time been unable to get a berth, the owners well knowing that to their superstitions sailors his presence, on account of his ghostly reputation, would prove discouraging, and thus it jure the luck of their vessels. The loss of an eye by lightning, during one of his sea disasters, his thin, wild face, his thick elfin locks, hanging to his neck, his bowed shoulders, his stander, wiry form, and singularly light, active step, pave to him a certain unearthly appearance, which only served to strengthen the belief that he was deserving of the weir I reputation attached to his name.

One morning, after having been for many weeks obliged to the upon the searty wages of his daughter, who had set up a private school, Brandon sauntered forth, in the midst of a driving storm, hoping almost against Lope, to obtain a berth aboard some one of the vessels in the harbor, preparing for a servoyage.

At er making several us less applications, he at length four I himself standing under the jib-boom of a New London vessel—the Albatross by name—which had put into this port several weeks before for repairs, her main-topmast having been carried away in a squall just outside the harbor. Boarding her, he found himself face to face with the first-mate, a fine-looking young man of twenty-nine.

"I would like to ship in your craft," said Brandon, in the humble tone which is sometimes the consequence of discouragement.

"We do want a few more hands," said the mate. "What Brandon smiled and answered, "Any thing; I would like a third-mate's berth."

"We had better go and see the captain," said the young man. "Come."

And he led the way into the cabin. Here Brandon was agreeably surprised to find his old friend Captain Blake. The latter was delighted to see him, and the two shook hands, warmly.

Afterward, Blake, laying a hand on his mate's shoulder, said:

"This is Harry Warlock, the youngster who—who—" here he lowered his voice almost to a whisper, "lashed your little child to a spar on—on that day!"

Brandon quivered all over; then, dashing a tear from his one eye, he grasped Warlock's hand in a fervent grip.

"God bless you!" he exclaimed.

This was all he could say; a choking sensation in his throat prevented further utterance.

Mastering his emotion by a strong effort, Brandon now surveyed the young mate, who had hitherto remained silent, much affected by the other's grief. The years which had passed since he was cabin-boy on the ill-fated Griffin, had molded the frame of Warlock to a hardy, masculine be may, well fitted for the storms and hardships of a sca-life. His brown cheek glowed with health, his dark eye flashed a high: pirit, and his broad brow was full of intelligence that soften a every feature. In a word, a better looking young scan and than he was never walked a ship's deck.

experienced Brandon, as he again shook hands with Warlock.

"Ay, sy," answered the captain; "I could not wish for a better"

Learning from his friend his desire to ship, Blake chapped a hand upon his (Bran lon's) back, as it glad to secure him; then, suddenly looked down, shaking his head.

"Bill," said he, sorrowfully, "I've heard of your—your reputation; such things, do you see, travel very far—and—and—why, blast me, old chum, but it's hard—I don't know as I'll care to take you for fear of the effect you'll have on my men—a superstitious set they are, Bill—most all Portuguese and is enakas. Still, I want to take you—I must take you, but—i et— Warlock, my lad," he suddenly added, clapping his mate on the shoulder, "can not you help me out of this acrape? What have you to say about it?"

"Take him, by all means!" cried Warlock, impulsively.

"But the trouble, had-the trouble he'll get into with the men; you don't think of that."

Brandon turned upon his heel.

"Good day, Blake; I'll never be the means of making trouble in my old chum's vessel."

"Stay!" cried the captain, a sudden idea seeming to flash upon his mind; "you have a daughter?"

" Yes."

"Well, if you can persuade her to go with you, every thing will be right; for I have heard your superstitious fellows say that a woman abourd the same craft with a Jonah destroys entirely the Jonah's influence. So, you see, old chum, a woman aboard would satisfy my men."

"I think Mary will go with me," said Brandon, rubbing his hands gladly; "she takes after her father, and is fond of blue water."

"I expect the voyage to be an unusually lucky one," said blake, as I am going to a newly-discovered bay in the Ochotsk Sea, where whales are as thick as gooseberries. I will also give you an excellent lay, if you can manage to go with me in the way I have mentioned."

Brandon's one eye lighted up like a cord of fire. He rubted his hands gladly, and looked down at his tattered boots thinking how soon could be go with his friend, and replace them by new ones.

He hurried off to his home, an humble one, but kept in changing color, lively brown eyes, and the lightest foot that ever pressed the earth. This maiden would not for a moment put any hindrance in the way of her poor father's success, so the at once consented to go with him.

CHAPTER III

THE TEMPEST.

THE wind made the spars of the Albatross crack, as she went bowling out of the harbor. By noon the land was faint off the starboard quarter, and the foam came flying merrily over her bows.

On the quarter-deck stood Mary Brandon, watching, with fominine curiosity, some of the men at work aloft, and those who were forward catting and fishing the anchor, under the superintendence of her father, who occupied the position of second-mate, in place of a worthless fellow, who had deserted at New Bedford.

Among those who worked under Brandon was a gray-headed old fellow of sixty, named Tom Burke. The latter held a marlinspike, with which he would heave the lashings taut as they were passed round the anchor. He was a New Bedford man, and knew Brandon well, had heard of his reputation as a Jonah, and, worse yet, he believed in it.

The marlinspike with which he worked, dropping from I is hand several times, he shook his head ominously, and mutered between his teeth something which the secon l-mate could not hear.

- "Come Tom, speak out," said Brandon, smiling. "You were never before in the habit of speaking 'under hatches.'"
- "Well, there, it never happened to me before," said Tem, to drop my marlinspike three times."
- "You haven't been taking any whisky, I hope," said Bran-don, knowing Tom's failing.
- "Not a drop, sir, except about half a pint, which I first 19

Brandon aughed, and said perhaps that was what made the man's hand so unsteady.

"No," answered Burke, solemnly, "it is because there's a JONAH in this craft."

"Hush!" said Brandon, in a low, stern voice. "I know you mean me; but, remember, if you will hold to your foolish superstition, that there is a woman in the vessel."

"Ay, ay, sir. I know that, and as long as she's aboard I won't complain, more'n I can help. None of the men, being Kanakas and Portuguese, know you, but me, and for your take I'll try not to let on who the Jonah is."

"You are a good fellow," said Brandon, extending his hand.

Tom thrust his quickly into his pocket,

"No," he said, hoarsely, "they say that a Jonah's hand gives other hands the 'parysaleratus'."

At that moment the captain called Burke to take the wheel, as the man there did not steer to suit him. The work of lashing the anchor was soon finished, and the second-mate was about moving aft, when he noticed that the hinges of the brakes needed slushing, and ordered one of the men to grease them. The person to whom he spoke was a man with remarkable long legs, a short body, and a little head, ornamented with stringy locks of yellow hair and beetle eyes.

Punk, such was the name by which this person was known, was a pretended phrenologist. He had in his possession an old greasy book on that science, which, it was his especial delight to boast to his shipmates, he had read through a dozen times.

He had already examined the head of the captain, and given him an excellent character, on the strength of which the skipper—who, to tell the truth, thought more of whale-oil than of all the sciences in the world—had sent him a bottle of good whisky, some of which, as hinted, had fallen to the share of Tom Burke.

Punk, having never been to sea before, had conceived romantic ideas of a sailor's dress, and wore a broad, blue collar, a huge glazed hat, with a long, flowing ribbon, loose pants of canvas duck, much too short—he had not been able to procure a pair long enough for his legs—and pink slippers number ten. Thus attired, and with an enormous quid of tobacco in his right cheek, he now stood upon the windlass, his arms folded over his chest, pants and ribl on rustling in the wind, and imagined that he was the very picture of a "true American sailor." Never having chewed tobacco before, this "American tar" felt disagreeable at the moment the second-mate addressed him, and so, taking out the quid, threw it overboard to windward, whereas it should have been thrown to leeward.

"Bear a hand !" cried Brandon.

"Ay, ay, sir; bear a hand it is!" said Punk, endeavering to speak in a sonorous voice, while, in reality, his tenes were like the squeaking of a cart-wheel.

When he had greased the hinges, the mate ordered him to put in one of the brakes and try it.

"Try it it is, sir!" answered Punk, and putting in the handle, he went to work.

" That's he!" cried Brandon, (meaning that will do.)

Punk, however, thinking he was praising him, kept on.

"That's he, I say!" repeated Brandon.

"That's he it is!" answered Punk, working harder than before.

Brandon soon stopped him by explaining to him what he meant; for the second-mate was never violent with his men.

"Ay, ay sir," sail Punk, grinning; "I understand. My eyes and tarry to'lights, shiver my timbers if I don't."

And he scraped the deck with his right foot, having heard this was "sailorish."

The movement brought his large tarpaulin down over Liseyes, whereupon he gave his long legs what he deemed a natical twist, and pushed the hat back from his brow.

"Although something of a sailor," said Punk, now thrusting his hand under his waistband, "I'm skillful, sir, in examining heads. Shall I examine yours?"

"Not now," answered Brandon, as he moved aft.

One morning, about a forthight after, he sail to the ca; tain:

"I perceive you have a phrenologist aboard. I hope he's a better phrenologist than sailor."

"He is green, most unmarcifully green," crick Blake, striking the rail with his clinched fist, "but he does know somethin' about heads, I believe. He examined mine, short time ago, and perhaps you'd like to have him look at Miss Brandon's."

"Certainly," said the second-mate, good-humoredly. "How would you like that, Mary?" he added, turning to his daughter.

"Oh well, papa," she answered, "I have no objections."

The captain called Punk aft to examine Mary's head.

The four were soon in the cabin, when Punk, with a knowing sort of hop, like that of a loy on stilts, remarked, after lightly touching the top of the girl's head:

"Here we have tremendous alamativeness, together with disholical conjugal perfection."

Bran ion opened his one eye very wide, while Blake, who, as sireally hintest, knew little of the science of phrenology, shook his head, admiringly.

This person," continued Punk, "is excessively alire to a good dinaer, especially vegetables. Her lamentativeness is the one failing of her contentious nature, which is decidedly performantativeness is her great—"

"Avast there!" cried Blake. "That's a mistake; lamb and taters isn't your favorite; is it, miss?"

"In a word, this person," continued Punk, with a superior smile, not beeling the interruption, "is a —"

Bir-r-r-! whiz-z-z! boong! belang! crack! snap!
rattle--rattle--rack-he-de-rack!

The captain sprung up as if shot, and rushed on deck, closely followed by his mate.

A squall had struck the ship, and was making mal music in her rizging. A sulphurous haze filled the air; the vast ocean was one great mass of hissing, boiling foam. Swift as an arrow, with a long, grinding continuous crashing sound, as if invisible ax-men were splitting up ner timbers, reverberating through her oaken rits, from stem to stero, the vessel tore along through the storm-lished waters. Her lofting sails having partial, the larger canvis was slowing and whipping along, while the dial of thunder. The air was find with flying this has of feam, strangely contrasting with the dark, sulphurous vapors, whirled along the blast with aimost iscredible swiftness.

Rumbling, crackling, crashing and roaring, the sterm deepened, thickened, darkened, grew heavier and heavier. Through the far-extending network of driving sand, rain and hail, something black suddenly was seen rolling along like a huge winged monster.

This was a gigantic cloud, which, rising from the eastern horizon, had, in the space of five minutes, reached the thip, and was now passing over her trucks. Along the edge of the mass played lurid fires, the electricity with which the cloud was charged, while the continual crashing, snapping and booming of the thunder made the heavens ring again!

Meanwhile, enveloped in sheets of driving spray, the vessel continued to boom on, burying bow and lee-rail at every plunge, and quivering as if about to fly into a thousant pieces. Heedless of the seas dashing over him, sou'-wester on head, trumpet in hand, Captain Blake stool sounding his orders, while the men vainly endeavored to clew up the slatting masses of canvas. As to Punk, he suddenly seemed to have lost all desire to play the "American tar." At the first notes of the squall he had jumped into the fore-hold, and buried his nose in a coil of rigging, with his lengthy legs protruding upward. He was by no means a coward, but like many men of imaginative temperament, he was strongly imbued with a sense of the sublimity and awe-inspiring grandeur of a storm at sea!

"Ahoy, there! you Punk, blast ye, where are you?" howled the captain, noticing the absence of that person.

He rushed forward, peered into the hold, and there beliefd, first Punk's legs, and then the rest of his person, upon which he could not help dealing several smart applications with a rope's end.

Just then a crash, as if the heavens were opining to a thousand thunder-bolts, broke upon the captain's eur. He rushed on deck to find the ship upon her beam-ends, eug. It in rouring masses of overwhelming water. The black chaid had parted, and a conter-sport was rushing down upon the devoted ship. Round and round she whitled, in a voiley of hissing, gurgling waters—crash, crasher, rack, boong! and away went her three topmasts, one after the other, falling alongside!

The wreck dragging her under, still round and round in the engulting water-spout she whirled, her timbers cracking her hull settling lower every moment.

In another minute she must go to the bottom with all on board; of this the white-lipped crew aging to whatever afforded them support, were well aware, and hoarse shrieks, drowned amid the torrent—the huge, sheeted, descending torrent of maddening waters—were faintly heard!

Appalled by their fearful situation, all speech soon died upon the lips of that terror-stricken crew. The eyeballs of the Kanakas rolled in their heads, while the Portuguese, with their white faces turned upward, seemed to implore the protection of their favorite saints.

A fearfil silence lay upon the lips of every man for a minute, when the voice of old Tom Burke was heard, piercing the storm-din.

"IT IS THE JONAH!" he shouted, "the JONAH who's

And the old tar, obeying an impulse he seemed incapable of resisting, pointed toward Brandon, who stood near the stump of the mizzenmast, holding on to some rigging.

At this the dusky Kanakas and Portuguese gnashed their teeth, and, even in that dread moment, laid their hands upon their bowie-knives!

"Kill the Jonah! cut him to pieces!" was shrieked forth on all si les, and several men advanced, threateningly, toward the second-mate.

Mr. Warlock, the young first-mate, here advanced to interpose, but he had not taken ten steps when there was a trementous shock, as of sudden electricity darting through the ship, and every man was thrown down!

With a rushing, sweeping sound, the vast sheets of water, tossed hither and thither by the exploding of the water-spout, and breaking into thousands of bubbles, poured over the ship, almost smothering and stanning the awe-stricken crew, before they could regain their feet. The captain, now seeing his vessel plunging, hows foremost, into a caldron of waters like a whirlpool; perceiving, also, that she was about being expliced—that the two men at the helm had been washed everboard—that the two men at the helm had been washed everboard—that there now seemed no possible way of escaping his doom, stood staring, open-mouthed, straight ahead of him, perplexed as to what order he should next give other than that of telling his men to prepare for their fate.

While he stood thus, a lurid gleam shot into his face; it was the flash from the one eye of the supposed Jonah, as he dashed amidships! Through the mass of bubbling, roaring waters he rushed; through the sheeted spray, flying to the very trucks, he fearlessly made his way! A great volume or avaluache of water poured across the weather-rail, roasing him over and over, sending him whirling to be wards or sight, like a shot!

The spectators believed that he was gone; momentarily expecting their own doom, they gave the matter little heel, but with bated breath and rolling eyes—some of them mattering about mothers, sisters and relatives—others, between their teeth, uttering short, half-formed prayers, they stood, awaiting a fate which seemed inevitable!

Up from the cabin, wild-eyed and pale, came Mary Brandon. "Oh, God!" she shricked, "must we be lost? Is there no way to save the ship?"

The Jonah, miss! it's all the Jonah's doings!" muttered Tom Burke, as he tied a rope round her waist to prevent her being at once washed overboard. Stunned, almost bewildered by the terrible noises that smote upon her cars, the creaking crash of timbers, the gurgle and wash of overwhelming waters, the cracking of the spars, the howl, the shrick, the maldening roar of the raging storm—she stood, unable to articulate another word!

At that dread moment, when all were prepared for the worst, a dark, slender form, with neck turned sideways like a snake's, shoulders bowed, black heir dripping, one eye shooting forth a red flash, was seen starting up from the callron of waters amidships.

It was the Jonah, who, now clutching tight the rape, by means of which he had saved himself from going ever ori, out the storm-din in two with his clear, sharp, metallic vice, ringing like an anvil!

"To the wheel, there, one of you! Hird-hird ret! Steady! Luff a little and meet her!—that's he—nov, then steady as you go?"

To the wheel the young first-mate, Mr. Warlock — the had been severely braised by the falling of one end of the shattered mizzen-topm est across his leg—having quickly dragged him-self aboved Brandon's orders to the letter.

The one eye gleamed hopefully; a moment it's light was valled by another sweeping sea; then the anvil voice was again heard.

"HARD-A-STARBOARD! A pull at the weather braces!"

"Ay, ay, now—that's the sort!" cried Captain Blake, who, seeing his ship right a little, and, like some huge monster, stake herself clear of the overwhelming seas, gathered confidence and coolness.

The men, obeying Brandon's magnetic voice, executed his order promptly; the ship first luffed up, to meet a huge wave that otherwise must have overwhelmed her, now being kept c.f. shot ahead, roaring like a wounded lion!

"No use!" cried Blake, "for though we're saved for the present, the craft soon must go down, as she's well-night water-logged, in sich a storm as this!"

Brandon shook his head; then, while his single eye glaimed triamphantly, he pointed skyward where a golden green of light was visible. That gleam grew brighter every moment; the last cloud of the squall was passing over the slip, the next moment it had passed, and the vessel lay becalined—the squall had gone—stopped suddenly, like a giant in his wrath, leveled low by a shaft or an electric bolt.

While a murmur of joy circulated throughout the vessel—while Mary stood encircling her father with her arms, while the young first-mate, bruised, weak, and bleeding, leaned against the helm, watching the girl with an ardent gaze, who hould come strutting along, hands under waistband, tarpauling ushed back from forehead, a quid of spunyarn in hou of tobacco in his right cheek, but Funk, the gallant "American tar."

He addressed himself to Mary.

"Coolness and self-possession in peril is the pecclearium of your thoroughbred sailor," he remarked; "and if you had been forward you would have seen how perfectly unmoved I was through the whole of the terrific storm. Ay, ay, shive my tarry to'lights ?"

That Punk was unmoved during the storm no person could dispute. Upon his knees, with his nose in the coil of rigging in the hold, he had remained from the commencement, without budging an inch.

CHAPTER IV.

REBELLION.

WHILE folded to her father's bosom, Mary, chancing to glance toward the helm, beheld Mr. Warlock, and at once comprehending his situation, hurried, excited by womanly pity and admiration, to direct her father's attention to the young man. It was high time, for Warlock, now almost unconscious, could scarcely support himself. He was conflucted to his berth in the cabin, where the steward at once proceeded to wash his bruises with cold water, and to administer an inspiring cordial.

Meanwhile the captain rigged jury-masts. A breeze strung up toward the middle of the day, and the ship slowly forged ahead on her course toward Fayal, Western Islands, where the skipper intended to stop for repairs.

"Thank God our troubles are now over," said Mary; "we have a good breeze."

"Ay," muttered Tom Burke, between his teeth, and half under his breath, "they are over just for the present, young lady; that Jonan will give us some more before long. If it hadn't been for the gal in the ship we'd have gone to the locker down below, afore this!"

He moved forward with sullen air, and seated himself by the windlass-bitt.

"What think?" inquired a Kanaka, confronting him, and showing his teeth—"what think now? No Jonah aboard, eh? Make mistake!"

"Hush, blueskin, hush! I have nothing more to say about it."

" How know dis second-mate Jonah, eh?"

That is known everywhere," replied Burke—" everywhere by them that knows him."

" If Jonah, best get him out of way. No-"

"Hush, you lubber. No, I said no such thing. Where there is a woman aboard a ship, she outmatches a Jonah, prevents him from doing terrible harm, though not altogether."

"Ho, ho, ho! hi, hi, hi!" laughed the Kanaka; "me no that understand."

Tom rose and moved away. He sat down on the knightheads, and with eyes half shut, and a grim smile round the corners of his mouth, watched Punk, who, with rolling gait, was now walking to and fro round the forecastle.

The next morning the young mate appeared on deck. He had already exchanged a few words with Mary, and now, finding her near the quarter-rail, had lifted his cap respectfully with his left hand, for his right was in a sling.

"Good-morning," he said, smiling; "I hope you are well, after yesterday's storm, which must have frightened you much."

"I am very well," she answered, "and hope you are the same " and here her soft eyes beamed pity. "I perceive that you have not yet recovered from your injuries."

"They were nothing to speak of," he answered, indif-ferently.

At that moment, chancing to look forward, his face wore a troubled expression. Mary followed his glance, and perceived that the eyes of the Kanakas and Portuguese were turned upon her father, who stood in the waist, in a dark, significant manner, which, she thought, boded no good.

"Why do they look so at papa?" she inquired; "surely they can have nothing against him, after his saving the ship. That foolish belief in his being a Jonah must, by this time, have become destroyed."

"I don't know," answered Warlock, uneasily. "Still, you may rest assured that no evil shall come to your father while it is in my power to prevent it."

"Thank you, sir; oh, thank you!"

She spoke earnestly, for her fears were much excited.

At that moment Warlock was summoned from her side to superintend the repairing of some slight damage, which, during the storm, had been sustained by the rudder. A whale-boat being lowered, in it two men soon were in their places a work. The young mate, while seated on the rail, overlooking them, had the pleasure of seeing Mary again by his side. Their glances met; the girl blushed deeply, Warlock half smiled, and both felt that the presence of each was to the other attended with those pleasurable sensations which generally precede love.

"Do you really think they will attempt to harm papa?"

she inquired.

"No," he answered; "I trust not. I shall, however, be on the watch."

From this subject they glided on to others. The girl found her companion a very intelligent young man, who had employed every leisure moment of a sea-life in improving his mind. His air—gentle yet manly—his upright form, and deep, musical voice inspired her with the most pleasurable seasations.

When night came, and she retired, she lay a long time, with the brown, manly face of the young mate constantly intruding upon her mind, and warming her young checks with the first blushes of awakening love.

The weather remained good, with fair winds, for two weeks, by which time the Albatross was anchored off Fayal. Here she remained a month, when, new masts and yards having been fitted, she resumed her course for the whaling-grounds, off the coast of Brazil, where her captain intended to cruise for a short period. The first intimation that the crew received of their being on that well-known ground was the orders to double-reef topsails, and haul down the flying jib.

"We're in for a cruise," muttered Tom Burke, when sail was shortened; "but little luck we'll have with a Jonah aboard of us."

"Say so?" gritted through his teeth a tall Kanaka named Marhi, the brother of one of those who had been lost off the ship during the gale—"say so? Well, me so think, too. B'pose go aft, and tell captain to put dis Jonah ashere!"

"No," answered Tom; "there mustn't be none of that There's a woman aboard, do you see, and I've heard it said that them creatures does away with Jonah's power, though I some'at doubt it, 'specially when the woman is the Jonah's darter."

"Below there!" came down at this instant, from the fore-

"Ay, ay?' shouted Warlock, springing into the waist.

"A acad whale right ahead, sir, with an iron in him."

"Stand by the boars! Lower away!" were the orders, following each other in quick succession, when down went the two vessers, crashing into the waters alongside.

Into them tumbled their crews; in the second-mate's boat were Tom Burke and Marhi, and all were soon pulling like mal. There was not much wind; the sea by almost steaming but under the barning sun, and thin, sickly-looking varies were speeding like phantoms through the air. The dark focs of the oursmen, lifted up as they leaned back, reddened like live coals, while above them, in the stern-sheets, glowed the one eye of Brandon like a glemning star. Upon the flushed face of Marhi it was turned with a penetration that made the Kanaka grind his white teeth, until they emitted a sound like the scraping of knives.

"That's he; lie!" (stop pulling) cried the second-mate, when his boat was within ten fathoms of the whale. The weary crew gladly put their ours a-peak, and panting, turned to look at the whale. Marhi, his red tongue lolling like a wolf's, thrust his heated left hand into the sea, hoping thereby to cool it; then uttered a sharp cry, and hastily withdrew it, covered with blood.

A shark had seen the hand, and shooting upward, grasped one of the fingers, making off with it.

"Ock!" shouted the Kanaka, as he now wrung his woan led , hand; "Jonah cause of dis!"

Ten Burke shock his head gloomily, and glonced represchfully at Brandon, who, however, to like a header the exclusive tion nor the glonce, at once motomed to one of the near losts. This coming up, the Kanaka was transferred to it, and ferried aboard ship.

Soon after, the whale being fastened to, was towed alongnice It was "cut in" that same day, and in ferty eight hours was tried out, making twenty barrels of sperm oil.

Meanwhile Marhi, who was by no means a shak, remained on deck, working as well as he could with his left han!. Unfortunately, while handling the blubber, a piece of black skin somehow worked its way to the stump of his finger, without his knowledge.

Every whaleman knows that this skin is poisonous, and when scratched or wounded the sailor usually is careful not to come into contact with it. Reckless Marhi had cause to repent of his carclessness, for soon, the victim of the most excruciating pain, he was obliged to go below. Before night his hand was swollen like a football, and through his wild veirs his blood, coursing like molten lead, sent fever and delinion to his brain. Two men could not hold him to his brak; he writhed and screamed, declaring, in frenzied accents, with the well known superstition of the Kanakas, that the spirit of his brother was in the shark! He added that the creature had thus taken revenge on him (Marhi) because he had not aver so d his (the brother's) death upon the Jonah.

For three whole days he thus raved, when he beare calmer, though still very noisy and excited. He could neither sleep nor cat, and his frame wasted to the proportions of gaunt skeleton. The other Kanakas, with the Portuguese and Burke, grew dark and sullen. Brandon was often the sulject of conversation among them; they agreed to march aft and endeavor to persuade the captain to put the Jonah ashore. One afternoon, while they were thus deliberating, the tall, gaunt figure of Marhi stalked among them like a dusky ghost.

" Come, go below," said Tom Burke.

"No!" exclaimed Marki, tossing his will-lo king hir back from his face; "me go aft and kill! kill! kill! kill! Lill Jenah."

"Hush: you must not talk so."

"Come!"-shricking in a ptercing voice-"come, never, never luck have with Jonah! Come!"

There was magnetism in the voice of the speaker. Kan and Portuguese gathered round him, their eyes ghaming, their white teeth grating. Mary, on the quarter-deck screaming, rushed to her father's side.

" Papa, oh, papa, do go below-quick !"

There was a yell forward, and with a wild rush, the dusky crew came at, brandishing knives and handspikes.

"Kil!! kill!" yelled the Islanders.

- "That sounds bad," said Burke, turning to Punk, who, with his hands thrust beneath his waistband, and his long legs stretched far apart, stood behind the windlass, glancing aft.
 - " Ay, ay; bad it is," answered Punk.
- "Come, we must help our own color," added Burke, picking up an ax, and running toward the quarter-deck.

Bing, crack, crack! went the captain's revolver.

Punk heard one of the bullets whizz past his head.

"Ahoy there, shiver my splinters!" shouted the American tar, and down he went into the forecastle.

Here he commenced a fierce assault upon the pots, pans, and spoons of the Kanakas, ranged on shelves above his head. He kicked the tinware into a corner, he stamped upon it, he wrenched off the handles from the cups, and broke the forks and knives.

"I'm not quarrelsome, except when I'm roused!" he exclaimed, when he had finished.

Then he stretched himself upon a chest, with his arms folled, and each foot thrust in a broken coffee-pot.

Meanwhile there was no child's play on the quarter-deck. Warlock had knocked one of the Kanakas senseless; the captain had seriously wounded another with his revolver; the rest stood at bay, brandishing their knives, and preparing for another rush. Brandon had thrust Mary through the companion out of harm's way; he now advanced with upraised hand.

"Bick, back where you belong, and do your duty!" he shouted.

A yell of derision was the only response; then, tiger-like, Marki was upon him, with his huge strength quickly hurling him to the deck.

"Kill! kill! kill Jonah!" screame! the other Kanakas, and in a mement half a dozen knives were leveled at Brandon's heart. The captain, with Warlock, Tom Burke and the other mates and harpooners, rushed to the rescue; but it was evident that they would not succeed in beating back the dusky mutineers in time to save Brandon.

Subleady the latter raised himself upon his chow, and, his one eye glowing like a lurid light upon the man whose blade was nearest his heart, exclaimed, in a voice that rung through the ship like the cracking of a topmast:

"Hell, hold! ye dusky devils! By the fiend, if ye lay a hand upon me, my spirit shall come up from the bettom of the sea and sink ye down, down, down like so many rats."

Appalled by these words, the wild crew firmly believing that Brandon had power to execute his threat, drew back, lowering their knives.

Even Marhi was abashed.

He thrust his knife into his belt, and muttering, "Some other time," moved sullenly forward, followed by the others, all of whom now were cowed into submission.

Mary was overjoyed when clasped to her parent's bosom.

- "Let us leave the ship, papa," she said; " we may have more trouble."
- "No," Brandon resolutely answered; "I have shipped for the voyage, and I'll go through with it, if the captain is willing."
- "Ay, ay, with all my heart!" said Blake. "Soener than lose you I'd ship a new crew forward!"
- "I'm sorry for that," muttered Tom Burke, as he entered the forecastle.

The sight which there met his eyes astonished him. Punk had hidden himself in the fore-hold, but there lay the battered tinware in a corner!

The Kanakas raved and stormed, but the true author of the mischief was never suspected. From the fore-hold he had made his way aft to the steerage, and having slyly ascended the main rigging, he was now coiling a repe in the top.

CHAPTER V.

IN AND OUT OF PORT.

Past the tragrant Brazils the Albatross, when her cruiss

Although under fall sail, her mas-theads were still manned; for a whider, even when homeward bound, carries her sinembrowned lookouts upon her three top-gallant cross-trees. A chance whale may pop up at any time; visions of "sparmile" are forever greasing the brain of the skipper.

"There'll be tew whales taken aboard this craft!" grumbled Tom Burke, when for many days the ship had continued on without a spout being seen; "'cause there's a Jony in her, blast him!"

"Ay, ay; blast him it is?" ejaculated Punk, as he sat astradile of the lee-rail, one morning, drawing the water wherewith to wash down the decks.

With the sullen manner which they had shown ever since the day of the quarrel, Kanakas and Portuguese plied the brooms, used in scouring the oaken planks to a virgin whiteness.

Excepting naval men, none are more particular as regards cleudiness on ship and person, than whalers. The merchantmen, when he hears a "spouter" (whaling-vessel) spoken of, rolls his quill and contemptuously ejaculates, "The dirty tab!"

There is, however, more washing, scrubling and so ring determined about the "tab" than is performed about the real state traing-ellpper that ever cut blue water. The merchant versel usually looks neuter and trimmer, of course, because a riverages are shorter, and it is better made, and does not saffy the wear and tear of the during little whaleships, cracking along through the polarice for many months, built the time delayed with oil and begrined with the dark smoke from the chimneys of the try-works.

The weshing of a pair of pants, when saturated with oil, is a difficult job. Punk, scorning such menial labor, as unbecoming an "American tar," would usually either stow his oily pants away in some obscure corner, or throw them overboard, afterward drawing another pair from the slop-chest (a cask containing seamen's clothing.) Not so the Portuguese, thrifty fellows, who make rags and patches go a great way. One of these, a man with a huge head, did the washing for all the officers and bout-steerers, for which he received payments metimes in tobacco, and sometimes in coins. On the morning I speak of he had been up half the night, and although at the mast-head, he thought it no harm to in lulge in a nap.

Now Brandon was a strict disciplinarian, and could never bear to see a man asleep when aloft. With his single eye, he had acquired a wonderful "knack" of judging when a sallor was drowsy, and had, therefore, for some time, been watching the Portuguese at the maintop-gallant mast-head. Tom Barke, in his turn, stealthily watching Brandon, could not help muttering to himself now and then:

"Wonder what he's a-doing now. Trying to bewitch the man aloft, I believe."

"Ay, trying to bewitch the man aloft it is!" ejeculated Punk, overhearing him.

"Hush, you lubber! Who told you to repeat what I

Punt had spoken so loud that the Kanakas overheard him, and many anxious glances were turned toward their shipmate aloft. The one eye remained stealily fixed upon the masthead; it's owner finally rose, evidently with the intention of hailing the lookout. Before he could speak, however, the Portuguese, suddenly burching si leways in his sleep, turnified heallong, and fell into the sea, whence he never rose again!

Now a low murmur circulated among the dusky crew; they really believed that the Jonah had bewitened Le man, and thus been the cause of his fate!

That same night Warlock caught a number of them endeavoring to lower the whole-boot, with the intention of making off. He gave the alarm, and ordered them back.

They obeyed, reluctantly, promising that they would never try to desert in this way again.

The ship continued on her course, rounded Cape Horn, with the loss of her fore-topmast—this, like every other misfort me that had taken place, was laid to the Jonah—and finally arrived at her secured port, San Carlos, Chiloe Island.

ashore with her father and the young mate. They passed the old calaboose, and saw some of its chained captives emerging through the gate. They moved on, and walking through other quarters of the town, met pretty, dark-eyed Chilian damsels, on errands to the little shops, where delicious round cheeses, with calicoes and other goods, were promised on by heaped for sale. The swarthy horseman from the plains, spurred, mantled, wearing leather leggings, and with the lasso at the saddle-bow, clattered through the streets on his magnificent horse, and the armed vigitanté, with his long sword dangling upon the pavement, paraded with important air.

Leaving the town, with its irregular streets, the little party wandered among the high hills overlooking the harbor. Whole troops of green and striped lizzards crawled at their feet, and through openings in the shrubbery they caught glimpses of magnificent bulls, grazing on rolling fields of beautiful grass; over their heads the cedar spread its thick branches, also the pine, while here and there, rising from dense clumps of fragrant shrubs and plants—among which were visible the santolina and tinctoria—was seen the olive tree, nearly nine feet in circumference.

Leaning on the arm of her lover, for by this time she had learned to regard Warlock as such, Mary was very happy. The tright synshine, the twittering birds, the bay, flashing like silver beneath the green parapet over which they now waked, seemed in unison with the feelings of the young people. They strolled for several hours, and before they retarned to the ship the girl had promised to marry her comparison, when they should arrive home.

Two weeks later the All atross was really to sail for the San lwich Islands, whence, after supplies should be obtained, the world proceed on her northward course. A minister, Simon Dalton by name, had engaged a passage to the Islands, and was aboard.

Having heard of the superstition of the dusky crew, regarding the Jonah, he mounted the try-works, after the vessel had set sail, and in a brief, sensible speech, endeavored to turu the minds of his auditors from their ridiculous belief. The speech was without effect: when he was gone, Kanak and Portuguese shook their heads, and insisted that no good lack would come while Brandon was aboard.

Two weeks out from port, the well-known cry of "T ere blows!" came down from aloft.

The main-yard having been backed, the boats soon were giving chase. The crews pulled with life and spirit, and the little vessels fairly jumped. Brandon's long-timbel crew the the steady light from their officer's one eye, piercing their hearts, pricking them up to exertion like a red hot need to their blood seemed on fire, even while they trembled with a certain nameless feeling of superstitious awe. Taking the lead of the other boats, they were soon within duting distance of a huge sperm-bull, with a hump on him like a pile of oyster-shells.

"Give it to him?" howled Brandon, in a harsh voice, like the scraping of a knife.

The boat-steerer's iron whizzed and missed; something huge and black hummed through the air, then came down into the sea with the din of a hundred cannons! It was the whale's flukes, as the monster sounded in a cloud of whirling spray! A quarter of an hour after, up he came again, about a mile off the weather bow, going "eyes out," as it is termed, to windward. A determined glitter flashed in Brandon's eye.

"We must strike that whale!" he said, quietly. "Pill ahead?"

The pull was a long and hard one. The joints of the oarsmen cracked at every stroke; the sweat poured in street. street down their dark faces—their evelually bulged.

"We'll never get that whale," said Tom Burke, suiterly.
"We might as well stop pulling."

"MIND YOUR OAR!" gritted Brandon, through clinched teeth.

"Hard work, hard work, dis!" gasped a Portuguese.

" KEEP STROKE!"

"No pull one stroke more?" cried Marki, putting his car

" Pull AHEAD!" thundered the second-mate.

The Kanaka never budge I. A white line want through the air: it was Brandon's fist, which fell upon the rebel's huge head like a lump of steel. He fell; then sprung up, maddene I, sheath-knife in hand. Brandon parried his thrust with a puddle, and with the same, then dealt his adversary a stunning blow upon the head.

Down, you black rat, down!" he howled, as, with another estrate, he sent the knife spinning into the sea. The one the glared like a ball of fire; its uncarthly expression cowed the Kanaka at once. As he sat down the boat was lifted straight up from the sea; a huge white jaw opened near the bow! It was the whale's!

" GIVE IT TO HIM!"

Whir-r-r! hoo-o-o! chock! went the harpoon, buried to the socket in the monster's hump!

Now the crew were wrapped in spray; the uplifted boat relied, slipping down the whale's back.

Crash! and the cedar planks flew to chips, the crew, with the line and the line-tubs, being tessed promiscuously far up into the air! Into the whale-churnel, white waters they fell: there was a horrible scream, as the unfortunate Marhi, trem bling between the whale's teeth, was bitten in two; then down went the monster, roaring through the green chambers of the sea-depths like descending thunder!

Save Marki—who, of course, was killed outright—no man was hart. The swimmers, in the course of a quarter of an har, were picked up by the other boats.

Brandon, soon after, had the satisfaction of seeing the leviathan again fastened to. The monster had nearly taken all the line, however, before he again came up, after sounding it middle, having milled, he was now on a course which is that him across the bow of the ship.

"Stand by !" screamed one of the ship-keepers, who had dr grad a coil of whaling-line forward.

As the boat passed under the bow, he threw the end to Ermion, who at once secured it to that of the nearly expended line in the light vessel. Then, the line on the ship's deck having been fastened to the windlass, the harpoener in the boat disengaged his from the chocks.

Now, therefore, the whale was fast to the ship !

Bo great was the strength of the monster that he dragged this weight of three hundred tuns or more to windward, at the rate of eight knots! As she boomed along, with the apray flying over her bows, the two boats shot past her, their crews eagerly looking for the whale to come up. Soon the line slackened, and up he did come, breaching his full length cut of the sea, then falling back with the din of thunder.

The boats, attacking him on both flanks, the lances whistled through the air, and soon were stained with his blood. For some time Brandon had vainly endeavored to reach the life-spot, a part of the whale which, when struck, soon ends him. Fiercely anathematizing his ill luck, the daring officer, no longer able to contain himself, sprung upon the monster's back, and with his one eye vainly endeavored to find the coveted spot, now immersed in water. As if disdaining such a burden, the whale, quietly rolling, lodged him into the water, under his fin, and with one blow beat his senses out of his head!

With difficulty he was picked up; at the same moment the whale, turning, made straight for the ship, and drove its huge nead against the bow, staving a hole in the timbers, through which the water now poured with dismal gurgle! Soun ling, after the mischief he had done, the monster dragged the ship onward, while those aboar I endeavored to stop up the opening with a piece of canvas. This was accomplished, though in a clumsy manner. The leviathan coming up again, was killed; but, before he could be towed alongside, he began gradually to settle down! The discouraging truth could not be concealed: he was about to sink!

"Ay!" muttered Tom Burke, gloomily, as the evil eyes of Kanakas and Portuguese were turned upon Brancon, now restored to sense, "we might have known we'd never have luck while the Jony was with us!"

Meanwhile, lower sunk the whale, every moment; lines were secured to him, and, being passed to the ship, turns were taken round the windlass.

Creak, creak, creak—snap, snap, snap—cr-r-ack! And the principal line was rent asunder! The others soon parted in the same manner, when, with rushing, gurgling sound, down went the monster, sinking out of sight!

The men looked at each other with an expression of blank despair. To lose their whale, after all their trouble, certainly was discouraging.

They returned aboard, and, as usual, the misfortunes of the day were all laid to the fact of Brandon's being a Jonah

The dusky crew grumbled, and before night a party of them came aft, to be seech the captain to put Brandon ashore

Blake, who was in a bad humor, sent them forward, with in oath, bidding them never come aft on such an errand, again

Meanwhile, the wind freshening and the sea growing rougher, the canvas on the bow was found to be insufficient to keep the water out. The captain patched it up, as well as was in his power, but some of the timbers being cracked under water, he was unable to get at them.

"We must pile on every thing, and get to the Islands as soon as we can, for repairs," he said to his mate, in a low voice.

Mary overheard him, and approaching Warlock, inquired if there was danger.

"No," he replied; "if this wind holds, we will reach the Sandwich Islan's, I trust, before there comes on a blow!"

Unfortunately the wind did not hold; that same night is hauled round ahead, blowing quite fresh with a chopping sea.

Tem Burke, as usual, was full of gloomy prophesies, which so flightened Punk that he almost forgot to put on his "sailor airs."

By night the wind, still unchanged, blew a gale, sending the spray flying all over the ship in white clouds. The vestel leaked hally, and the captain had men stationed at the pumps.

"Fear not!" sail Warlock, encouragingly to Mary, as he rolle! up his shows to take a turn at the pumps. "We will soon have the ship clear!"

The minister, who loved fresh air exercise, took his turn with Punk to help him. The "American tar," rolling his quil furiously—for by this time he had learned to chew without being made sick—stooped, in a very unsailorlike manner, while pumping, and the minister, imagining that this was the way to do, stooped also. The cc isequence was that the knees of the two men kept coming in contact, cracking like billiard-balls!

All hands grinned, while Tom Burke curled his lip with a contemptuous sneer.

Pumping for several hours, the men could make no heal-way against the leak, which kept gaining. The seas became heavier, and the captain perceived that, if he endeavored to beat against them, his craft must soon become water-logged. Therefore, he squared in his close-reefed topsails, and put his vessel before the wind, thus steering north-west. Now the pumps, owing to the bows being more lifted, were able to make some headway; the water in the hold slowly but sarely decreased.

Dalton, the minister, recommended that all hands should be called aft to offer up thanksgiving to God for their escape.

"Ay, ay," said Blake; "a good plan—call 'em aft, Bran-

The latter obeying, the men come aft.

Dalton, mounting a cask, was about delivering a prefat ry sermon, when Blake pulled him by the coat-tail.

"Avast there, sir; just let 'em make a short prayer, as there's some barrels of pork and a few casks of 'ile' to be removed in the hold."

"In one moment," responded Dalton, with a wave of his white hand.

Then he launched forth with eloquence and simplicity, while Blake looked round upon the audience as much as to say:

"Did you ever hear any thing like it."

When at length Dalton mentioned something about the "post of duty and implicit obedience," the skipper compressed his lips and shook his head significantly at the dusky Portuguese and Kanakas. With open moaths and protraking eyes these men stood, staring at the minister, unable to comprehend a word, wherefore the captain's performine was entirely lost upon them. Perceiving this, Blake, determined to impress them, picked up a handspike, and than ped violently on the deck with it. Dalton reproached him for this rudeness with a mild glance.

"Beg pardon," said the skipper, "but them blueskins must be made to understand that part of your sermon relating to duty, which is most excellent—pre-excellent, sir!"

And thump went the handspike again.

Thus attracting the attention of the dusky auditors, the captain said:

"Put that in your pipes and smoke it, every blasted momer's sun of ye!"

"Hip! hip! hip! Shiver me!" exclaimed Punk, whirling round on his long legs, and waving his hat round his hal! "The post of duty, forever! Stand to your guns, my hearties."

"I perceive," said Dalton, turning with a smile to the captain, "that we have here an example of your true sailor. That tall son of the ocean seems to be one of those who constitute the glory of our merchant-marine."

"What! that 'ere Daddy Longlegs! Why, blast his eyes, sir, he's the biggest lubber in my craft?"

"A belier? Will you please explain—never mind, how-

And D Iton again launched forth into his sermon:

"When we look around us," said he, "at the broad, blue, rolling ocean, the far-extending vault of heaven, and—"

"Please sir," interrupted Blake, "cut it short. Remember the pork and the 'ile.'"

"In one moment. When we see the stars—in one sense these may be termed the eyes of God-we-"

"Them's my sentiments; but the pork and 'ile,' do you see?"

"Patience, for just one second. We are filled with wonder at the glory and magnificence, the beauty, sublimity and—"

The pork and 'ile,' bear in mind," said Blake, giving.

"The pork and oil!" repeated Dalton, unconsciously; then coloring at his mistake, he went on: "Sublimity and--"

"That's he! that's he, sir. Let's have a short prayer, now, when I can set my men to h'istin' them barrels."

Dalton, perceiving there was no alternative, jamped down and began to pray. When he was through the post and of were removed, after which Blake seered more at easy.

"The best part of your sarment," said he, grasping the minister by the hand, "was its shortness, which is the said of wit."

"Ay, ay," muttered Punk as he rolled past. "Shiver my to'lights."

CHAPTER VI.

ASHORE AND WHAT HAPPENED THERE.

THE gale continued, without much abatement, for four days, by the end of which time the ship, driven along at the rate of fourteen knots, was in the Japan Sea.

Far away, the blue line of the coast of Tartary was visible along the horizon, like a cloud. The captein, having resolved to put into one of the bays for repairs, steered directly for land, under every thing he could carry.

In the course of three days he entered a bay, far to the north-west, between two lofty ridges.

These ridges, with another in front, gave to the land the shape of a triangle, roughly curved in front. As the high elevation round him shielded the water from the win l, he at once commenced hoisting out of his fore-hold to lighten the ship, and thus raise her up forward. Both Warlock and Brandon entered the hold, mingling and working freely with the foremast hands. The young mate, by such behavior, never failed to win the respect and confidence of his men; and such, also, until he had carned his unfortunate reputation, ! I been the case with Brandon. Now the workmen, although really obeying him, watched him askance, with fex and distrust. They had no faith in the specess of any undertaking where he was concerned. The forward of the saip, being at length lifted, the carpenter, in a bout under the bow, went to work, repairing the damage. At this time the day was tine and clear, so that objects ashere could be seen a long distance. Mary stood on the quarter-deck, gazing towar l the coast, and thinking that she would like to go ashore, where she thought she could see a dark, moving mass, gli hag along the ridge of an elevated table-land, towering far above and beyond the rocks in front of her. The vision soon disappeared, when, turning to the captain, the girl informed him what she had seen.

"Ay," answered the skipper, who stood behind her. "I saw them too, evidently a band of Tartars, on their way to Siberia."

" Are not those people dangerous?" inquired the fair passenger.

"Most all are simple shepherds, hereabout," answered Blake, "who wouldn't be apt to harm anybody except enemics of war. But there are savage fellows, wandering round the country, as I know from the fact that the boat's crew of the Japan, whaler, were attacked, and had hard work to get off in their boat, after losing a man. Would you like to go ashore, miss?"

"To tell the truth, I did feel like going," answered Mary; "but what you have just said has frightened the desire out of me."

"There's no danger at all," said Blake. "You can see for yourself that the coast now is clear."

Still Mary hesitated.

Pank, overhearing the captain's remark, while coiling a rope on the quarter-deck, now advanced, touching his hat and scraping his foot.

"If you intend going ashore, captain, I should like to go with you. I'm a rough fellow, do you see—shiver my tarry trowsers; but for all that am always ready to protect beauty."

Here he rolled his quid, and turned what he intended for a nautical 'squint' upon Mary.

"Han protect beauty! Why blast you, man, if any thing should be protect to see those long legs of your'n a-gain' round, like a steamer's paddle-wheel, toward the ship."

Pack ed rol, and his ched up his waistband.

"We turn do get slan lered once in a while," he said, "but —alley sir! aboy! I shall let my deeds speak for me."

"They have spoken for ye," roared Blake, "and the story they've teld lasn't been to your credit. So forward ye go, and don't come aft here, boasting again."

He lifted his right foot, mechanically, to hurry Punk's movements. The "tar," however, needed no hurrying now. The sight of the uplifted foot, alone, sent him spinning forward, as fast as his lengthy legs could carry him.

To console himself for the way in which he had been treated, he entered the forecastle, and put on a pair of spotless pants of white duck, a new tarpaulin, with a ribbon ten inches long, and a blue shirt, with a huge, white star worked upon each collar. Thus attired, he returned to the deck, to be at once ordered into the lower hold amid dirt and oil, to remove barrels and casks.

Now Penk, although fond of playing the sailor, was averse to the hard work. He therefore exerted himself as little as possible, while pretending to make the most prodigious efforts

"A smart man, that fellow," said the minister, pointing Punk out to the mate, while the two stood upon the Fore-hatch

Warlock smiled. Pank, with his back to a cask, and his long legs against another, was pretending to shove with all his might, when, in reality, he did not push with the force of musk-rat.

"Oh he, ho, ho my, ah yo!" he ejaculated, in what he deemed true nautical style.

"How I love to hear that," said Dalton. "It speaks of industry There is something in the sturdy 'yo heave ho!" of our seamen—those 'buiwarks of the nation'—which, I may say, is truly inspiring."

"I am glad, sir, to hear you say so."

"Yes," continued Dalton, warming with his subject, "I repeat it: something inspiring, while the confidence which, in peril or her lahip, we may repose in those blue-shirted fellows, with their flowing collars and sinewy limbs, is almost—I may say is entirely without bounds."

"Here, my good fillow," said Dabon, taking a coin from his pocket, and holding it up before Pank's vision, "here is something to buy yourself tobace with."

"Thank your honor!" answered Punk, turning, and receiving the coin in his obstructched pulm; "thank ye. I will get a whole cargo of tobacco with that Ay, ay, shiver my splinters!"

He scraped his foot, then returned to his work, not perceiving that, while he stood up, Tom Burke, with grim fan, had substituted a half-filled burrel, in place of the cask. The fact that the barrel did not move an inch, showed the real amount of force exerted by this "American tar."

Monwhile, Mary having been persuaded by the captain to with him ashore, the starboard boat was lowered. Warden't and Brandon were also induced to go, the charge of the work being left to the third-mate, a smart young fellow, belonging to Nantucket. The boat soon was manned, the convenient of three Kanakas, as many Portuguese, and Pank—the latter being such a poor workman, the captain had concluded to take him—besides the officers.

Mary, separating from the rest of the party, passed through a deep garge, with the intention of strolling a little way into the interior.

- " What a pleasant day!" exclaimed Mary, with a smile.
- "Yes," he answered, "and I take it as an omen of our future."
- "You are in advance," said the blushing girl, softly. "People generally look upon the—the—wedding day as the one for that."

She looked so pretty, as she spoke, with the bright color tipen her smooth, round check, that Warlock involuntarily so led and kissed her. Then his arm stole round the neat, thexible waist.

May transled; he had never gone so far as that before.

'Paras: don't," she said, half smiling. "Papa, you have, can not be far behind us! Besides, what did I tell you once?"

At i sae playfully held up one little finger.

"You told me that you did not believe in a girl's lover a chart his arm round her in that way, until after marriage."

"I know I said so," she answered, looking archly at him, out of the corner of one of her eyes.

"Very well," said Warlock, respectfully, and sadly. "I had forgotten; but you will hereafter have no reason to complain of me."

He walked by her side in silence for some time, when she said, in answer to his last remark:

'I thank you very much for being so kind and forbearing."

He bowed, and looked pleased.

"Yes, you are very forbearing!" she went on, with the slightest possible tone of pique.

He bowed again.

"Oh, how provoking!" suddenly exclaimed Mary, tears springing to her eyes.

"Why, what is the matter?" inquired Warlock, anxiously, as she suddenly stopped. "Have you got a pebble in your shoe?"

"No; there is no pebble in my shoe," she answered, gravely.

"I have somehow offended you then !" exclaimed Warlock, deeply pained.

She looked down a moment; then suddenly she laid her ray check, wet with tears, against his bosom, her heart leating like a bird's.

" No; it was not on account of a pebble," she said, solemnly;

"it was because I grieved you, just now."

Warlock, still avoiding the pretty waist, endeavored to soothe her by declaring that she had not grieved him.

Still Mary wept, when, unconsciously, hardly knowing what he did, his arm again stole round the waist. He was about to hastily withdraw it, terror-stricken at his temerity, when a bright smile beamed through the young girl's tears, and the at once stopped weeping.

A light broke upon his mind.

"Oh!" he said, to himself; "so it was because I did not do this thing that she wept."

This reflection was interrupted by the sound of approaching footsteps. From behind a rock, about a hundred feet the eld of the two, came a band of wild-looking fellows, Tartars, with the exception of one, a stout, rough-looking man, wearing a dilapileted pair of sailor pants, evidently a deserter from some English ship of war. Each of the others was attired nearly alike, wearing shirt and trowsers of cotton, and over them a tunic of woollen cloth, open in front, and secured round the waist by a girdle, from which hung a long knife. All wore turbans on their heads, and boots that rose above their knees; their hair was long, and some had heavy mustaches, trimmed so as to give to the wearers an expression of peculiar fierceness. In statue there was but one, a youth not over twenty, who stood six feet. He evilently was the chief, as he walked in front of the rest. There was about him an air of intelligence; his appearance was neater than that of the others. His eyes, of a deep, I fight thue, were different from his companions', which were dark. The moment they rested on the form of Mary, they theshed admiration. His companions set up a wild shout, on seeing the two young people, and the chief seemed to find it difficult to keep them in their places.

Finally, forward they all rushed, when, drawing his only weapon of defense, a long, well-sharpened sheath-knife, Warlock, calling upon his shipmates to come to his assistance, stood prepare I to protect Mary to the last.

"Come, boys!" exclaimed the deserter. "If we're goin' to do any thing, let's do it; don't let one man scare us!"

The Tartar chief frowned upon the speaker. "Scient you!" he exclaimed. "We not want to hurt girl! Where belong?" he alled, addressing Warlock.

To the ship in the bay," replied the young man, "and I would in't advise you to molest us. We have plenty of men aboard, and-"

han hal, quick kill or drive back your men!"

"That's the talk—give it to him, will ye?" exclaimed the deserter.

A more repulsive-looking person than the speaker could not be imagined. His protruding jaw, small eyes, retreating principle to the imagined. His protruding jaw, small eyes, retreating principle, in the imagined head, and face covered all over with little spinous of reddish-colored hair, gave him something of the applicance of a gorilla.

with ever you may be," said Warlock, "I think it would be more becoming in you to endeavor to prevent these will men to an officing harm to a woman, than to urge them on."

"Ah, bah! All the becomin' has been knocked out o' a.e. until I've got tired of white people. Ask a man with three hundred stripes on his back, stripes got in the naval sarvice, to be becomin', will ye?"

At this juncture the captain, with Punk, Brandon, and several of his boat's crew, made his appearance. On hearing Warlock's call for assistance, the party had armed themselves with boat-lances, harpoons, etc., and each of them seemed determined to do his best except Punk, who, quite crested in could searcely walk on account of a peculiar tremor about the regions of the knees.

"For God's sake, let us hurry!" exclaimed Brandon, much excited, as the wild Tartars closed round his daughter and Warlock.

The girl had thrown both arms round her lover, as if to shield him with her own person from the knives of his assailants.

"Forward!" exclaimed the agonized father, as with uplified lance, his one eye flashing larid light, he bounded toward the group. The young chief sprung at him, knife in hand, while the rest, hurling Warlock to the ground, tore the girl from him.

Dodging a blow from the lance, the dusky leader, springing forward, seized Brandon by the throat, and raised his knife to deal a fatal blow. As he did so he caught the full expression in the other's eye, and for some unaccountable reason hesitated.

Why did he hesitate? The Jonah was said to be gifted with supernatural power; some such power now seemed to arrest the Tartar's hand. The second-mate then knocked him down, while Captain Blake sent his lance whistling toward the deserter, who, having caught Mary round the waist, was endeavoring to snatch a gold chain from her neck. The lance passed through the fleshy part of his shoulder, pinning him to the earth.

Meanwhile Warlock was fighting desperately with the who held him. One of the Tartars fell, bally wanted, beneath his knife, but before he could do more his arms were bent back behind him, so that he could not move them.

The boat's crew—with the exception of Pank, who ran away and bid himself—fought as well as they could with such oil: against them. They soon were overpowered; not one of them but bore about his person an ugly-looking Brandon's right check was seamed with a deep wound which he had received from a Tartar, while endeavoring to desh the fellow who had disarmed him of his lance against a rock. Having captured the whites, the band seemed for the rock to hold them in a firm grasp; but the miscrettle deserter, who had been pierced by the captain's recentially boiling over with rage, exorted his wild compained to cut the prisoners to pieces. The pain of his round evidently drove him almost mad; he rolled over and ever upon the ground, shricking, screaming out a terrible oath with every word he uttered.

Some of the Tartars seemed inclined to comply with his wishes. They glanced tiercely from their fallen chief, still laing unconscious, his head upon the knee of one of his men, to Brandon. They also glanced savagely at Warlock, whom it is probable they would at once have killed, but for the world cries and bemornings of Mary, who begged them to spare his life.

Finally they held a consultation, when one of them sail:

"Must kill one-one who strike down chief; must kill other who fight much and hurt one man very bad."

Value of the girl pleaded; the savage men threw both the sallors down, and drew their knives to inflict the deadly blow.

The knife of one had already touched Brandon's bosom, when the hand which held it was firmly grasped. The Tartar, turning, beheld Mary.

"S; are him!" she shricked; "he is my father!"

Her eyes were large, bright, and wild with terror. She trembled in every limb. The would be murderer could not witness the anguish of the girl unmoved; he drew back, when the voice of the deserter was again heard.

"Coward!" he screamed, "why don't ye do your work? That chap killed one of your best men, remember that."

The Tartar, hesitating, glanced alternately at the girl, at Brandon and the deserter.

Finally he called two or three of his companions assets.

held a brief conversation with them, and then said, in a distinct voice;

"One of the two men" (pointing to Brandon and Warlock)
"mus' die! Dese two fight much hard—knock down and kill more'n the odders; so that's it. Let her choose which!"
nodding toward Mary.

How was she to choose—to choose between father and lover?

She glanced from one to the other; she pressed her hand to her heart, as if to still its tremulous beatings.

Should she choose her father?

"No-oh, no!" her writhing spirit seemed to shriek. What? the parent who had watched over her so tenderly, whom she respected more than any being on earth; who had smiled upon, petted and guided her up to womanhood?

Warlock, then-choose him; he is young, has no living relatives to mourn him, and-

"Oh, God, no!" she murmured; "never, never—a thousand times never!"

He was deep down in her heart; she loved him with her whole soul.

She flew to the Tartar who had put this dreadful alternalive before her.

"For God's sake!" she pleaded, clasping her hands, turning her wild eyes up to him, "do not, oh, do not enforce this terrible—this fearful—"

"No odder way!" interrupted the man; "my men want, mus' have one of two die; see!"

He pointed to his companions, who, leaning on their long spears, stood glaring at Warlock and Brandon, like hungry wolves.

Again and again the poor girl vainly pleaded. Some of the boat's crew endeavored to save her the fearful task of choosing. They urged the Tartars to kill Brandon, if they must kill one. Brandon, they said, was a Jonah, and would bring ill-luck wherever he went.

"Ay, ay, the Jonah! Kill! kill! kill!" howled the Kanakas, who composed the greater portion of the boat's crew, "kill J mah !"

The Tartars, brandishing their spears, rashed on Brandon, joining their shouts to the cries of the Kanakas, until rock and cliff rung again. Mary threw herself upon her father's bosom, and, with one white hand, she motioned the wild men back.

"Away!" she screamed; "you must not-you shall not harm him! Oh, no, no, no!"

Doubtless, however, the Tartars would have torn her from her patent, and have pierced him with their spears, if the voice of tacir chief had not at that instant been heard. He had recovered his senses a moment since, and now advanced into the midst of his flerce tollovers, ordering them back.

As the flame of a flerce fire goes down beneath the rushing torrent, so the flashing eyes, the darkly-flushed faces, and wildly-bran lished spears of the Tartars receded before their chief. The young leader turned his glances upon Mary, his eyes beaming like stars, his whole face softening.

"Why so distressed? What you trouble?" he inquired, in a voice which grated far from unpleasantly upon the girl's ears.

Turning toward him, she could not help noticing that his form was tall and of unrivaled proportions, that his face glowed with manly beauty; that in fact he was far hand-somer, more civilized, more intelligent-looking than the rest of his band.

CHAPTER VII.

ABOARD SHIP.

Warlock did not fail to notice the agreeable impression made by the appearance of this man upon the girl whom he mended to make his wife. A pang of jealousy shot through aim; he endeavored, but vainly, to master it. Mary's manner showed that the chief did exert an influence over her.

Advancing to her side, the young leader took her hand.

"Beautiful—leautiful!" he ejaculated in a deep, rich voice -- "beautiful girl; me like much to make wife!"

Mary drew back, glancing toward Warlock. He was glad to see her do this; still it did not seem to him that, although the girl frowned, she was as displeased at the liberty taken as she should be.

Trembling all over with excitement, he saw the chief again size the little hand, this time carrying it to his lips, while he bowed over it as gracefully as a courtier. Mary blushed; ay, sie even smiled, and seemed, if any thing, less displeased than hore.

She, however, shrunk close to the side of Warlock, who, now burning to chastise the chief for his insolence, was struggling fiercely in the hands of his captors.

"Me love you!" exclaimed the young Tartar, "love much. Be my wife; we go together on fine white horse; give to you!"

Mary could not help smiling; she perceived her power, and no longer entertained fears regarding her party.

" No," she answered, firmly; " I would not do that."

"Why, why you no do-not love some other, ch?"

"I would not wish to leave my father," faltered the young girl, much to the disappointment of Warlock, who had hoped to hear her declare firmly that he was the only map she would ever take for a husband.

The chief's countenance brightened.

"Oh, is that all?" he cried, evidently agreeably disappointed not to hear her say that she already had a lover. "Never mind, take father with me. Come! if so do, if go with me, spare life of father and all!"

Mary looked down, and sail not a word; she evidently was thinking what reply to make.

Stung to the quick by her tardiness, in not at once scornfully refusing the offer made to her, Warlock, with one superhuman effort, breaking from those who held him, sprung forward, and bared his breast.

"If the sacrifice of a human life be the price of her refusal, mine is at your service! Strike! strike, dastard! Pierce me through and through a thousand times rather than take my Mary away from me!"

At these words, the truth of the matter seemed to dawn upon the mind of the young chief. His brow lowered, his eye fashed lightning, and with one bound, he sprung, knife in hand, toward Warlock.

Mary interposed in time

"Hord!" she said, emiling upon the chief; "hold! Do not

This speech, attered in the most indifferent manner possi-

"Mary!" Le guejel, "I had never dreamed of this!"

Of course the effect upon the chief, so deeply mitten with the claims of the fair prisoner, was exactly opposite to that upon Warlock. He advanced as his men again grasped the mate, and quietly encircling her waist with his arm, did what Warlock had not yet dated to do—impressed a kiss upon her lips!

True, she drew back quickly afterward; but Warlock thought he could trace but little displeasure upon her face. His heart sunk within him; his brain fairly seemed to swim. May glanced toward him, but there was an expression of in a ference upon her face, which only added to his tortures. To y were wrought up to the very highest pitch when, at I rath, the young Tartar, bending upon one knee, took both the girl's recresistery hands in his, and pressed them to his tips.

"Berniffel sea-girl! I like you to go with me-will you not go ?"

she excused herself as previously, when the Tartar, so lienly starting to his feet, turned toward his band, motioning to them with a stately gesture.

"Go?" he exclaime!—" ride back and tell my people that I will never return to them! Farewell! I am going away!—I am going to follow a star—to follow the sea-girl Farewell again?"

And be fl. I his spear to the cartin.

O'll Captain Blake hal listened to this speech with looks of wealt, not quite table to under tand it. Suddenly the train seem its break up a his mind,

"I talk I se into you, Tartar! Ay, ay, blast me if I don't! Y u me an that you'll leave your people, so as to go abourd my ship? Isn't that it?"

"That's it?" answered the chief. "I follow the sea-

"And little good that'll do ye, if I ain't mistaken in my reckoning. However, just answer me one thing: How is it that you haven't said a word either about paying or working your passage? P'raps you expect to get your allowance of grub for nothing, too? Ain't that so—ch, Tartar?"

"Don't understand! Mean pay gold, I suppose."

" Ay, gold ! that's it ! in gold or in work."

The Tartar smiled contemptuously.

"See !" he exclaimed, indicating his band with a wave of the arms, "me quick kill you all if like! Not kill—let go back aboard ship—that pay enough—no?"

"The pay sartainly is poor," answered Blake. "However, I don't know, after all, as I'll grudge you a passage aboard my craft. I may get my pay when we arrive home, by selling you to some museum. You may come aboard my ship, if you like, Tartar."

"Good I go at once !"

He turned to his band, who now came crowding round him gesticulating, speaking to him in their own tongue, in an excited manner, evidently beseeching him not to leave them. He was firm, however, and breaking from them, he followed the seamen, whom he now had set at liberty. His band came after him, brandishing their spears excitedly, and some of them even shedding tears. Warlock, chancing to glance toward Mary, perceived, to his chagrin, that she seemed much affected by these demonstrations of love for the young chief. The latter no v stepped into the boat, and the captain was about giving the order to give way, when a pair of long legs were seen, flying up over the top of a rock, not for from the beach. The legs were followed by a body, and then came the face, which, being turned toward the party, was discovered to be Punk's.

"Hello! hello, there! Alwy! shipmetes, ahoy," he shouted, fearing that he was to be left ash re.

"Harry up, you infernal labler!" howled Blake; "where was you while the fightin' was a-gein' on?"

"I-I have been looking for a big stone," answered Pank.
"I had no weapons, do you see, my hearties -- ay, sy, saiver

"Do you burrow in the earth to look for stones?" inquired Brandon, noticing that there were several chunks of clay clinging to the other's nose. All hands in the boat looked at Pank with expressions of the utmost contempt.

"You were never cut out for a sailor," said Uaptain Blake. "Bust ye, I've a good mind to tie ye up in the rigging, and give you a rope's end !"

At this Pink's head shrunk away down zetween his shoulders, and he threw his long legs over the ganwale of the best, so as to be ready to jump out of reach of the captain, if he should attempt to strike him.

The skipper, however, sail no more, and, in the course of balf an hour, the boat was alongside the vessel.

The Tartar, although it was evident he had never before boarded a ship, climbed the vessel's side with ease and agility.

Blake at once introduced him to the minister, Dalton, who surveyed the young man with no little interest and curiosity, wher he had heard the captain's story.

"I am surprised to hear him speak English so well," remarked the minister.

"Ay, ay, he does speak well for a blasted Tartar," cried the captain; "but there's a desarter—a lubber—ashore, who as targ't him and his band the lingo, I suppose."

While this conversation was going on, Warlock and Mary stood near the round-house aft.

The young mate, seeing the girl smile, as the Tartar passed them, leading on the arm of Dalton—who had resolved at once to take the wild fellow under his control and civilize him felt his jealousy revive.

"Mary," he said, hoking down carnestly upon her, "why did you act and spock so ashore? Why treat me so coldly?"

the pressure of his hand.

"No, indeed, I can not."

"Mon are stopil," she playfully remarked. "Know, then, that my reas n was to save your life. That wild chief would have torn you to pieces, had I given him cause to think that you were my lover."

"Never, oh, never will I distrust you again, my own noble girl," exclaimed Warlock, stooping, unseen by the rest of the crew, and kissing her.

A moment after, the Tartar again passed them. His fery eyes, lighted with admiration, were turned upon the girl, who cowered beneath his glance.

Warlock sighed uneasily.

"It is strange," said he. "that the captain should have per-

"It seems natural enough to me," answered Mary. "Evidently he would have carried me off but for that."

"I don't know," answered Warlock. "At any rate, I for one am not inclined to show him much kind attention. A robber and a murderer, he does not deserve it."

"I doubt if he ever murdered," said Mary. "For my part, I should have far less fear of him than of that white man whom we saw among the band. He seems, in fact, more intelligent than the rest."

Warlock listened rather impatiently to this speech. Smother ing his jealousy as best he could, he walked forward to attend to his duties in the hold.

These were soon finished, after which the captain went to work, getting up his anchors. He saw the band of Tartars ashore remain upon the beach, gazing toward the ship, and feared that they would come in accelerated numbers at night, and swimming to his vessel, attack the eraft. For this reason he was anxious to take advantage of a favorable wind, and of the carpenter's having finished repairing the bow, to leave the bay.

It was about seven bells, (half-past seven o'clock,) first night-watch, when the Albatross went bowling out of the harbor, under top-gallantsails.

The coast receded in twilight and distance, and the ship was soon well out at sea.

The made good time, and, in the course of a few days, was within a fortnight's sail of the Sandwich Islands.

Meanwhile, D.Pon had taken into his head to make a religious convert of "Tamerlane," as he had styled the Tartar, and by which name the latter now was known throughout the ship.

Branc's was amused at the many old questions put to the reverch I man by this child of the coast. As for the captain, he seemed to think it would be better to make the youth acquainted with whales and "sparm ile." He endeavored to teach him how to handle a harpoon and a lance, which lessons, by the way, seemed to please the chief better than Dalton's graver ones.

Brancion, somehow, had felt drawn to the young Tartar ir in the first, and truth must compel us to acknowledge that Mary was under the same mysterious influence. She fought a hist it, but somehow the presence of Tamerlane always appired her with peculiar sensations.

Warlock perceived this, and it troubled him much. He probably was the only person aft who held himself aloof, with celd reserve, from the young man. The latter, since coming abourd, had opportunities enough of judging as to the relation occupied by Warlock and Mary toward each other. He, therefore, was not at all anxious to cultivate the acquaintance of the mate.

Whenever the two met they would scowl upon each other in no amiable manner.

How different was the expression of the Tartar's face, whenever his glances rested upon the pretty teatures of Mary Brandon. Then his eyes would glow, and his whole soul, teaming with a limitation, seem concentrated in one look. Such a gaze could but please a much more fastidious damsel than the fair passenger.

One morning he stood leaning against the capstan, watchi.z, in his usual ar leat manner, the form of Mary, who had j st come up from the cabin, when Warlock accidentally jostled against him.

The name was on the point of apologizing, when he caugh the Tartar's plance, bent upon him from under a scowling law. This so angered Warlock that he forgot to make excuses.

"Dg!" cried the Tartar, flercely, "why hit 'gainst me?" A dangerous light came to the mate's eye. Up went his fist, down went the Tartar !

The latter rese, three himself upon the young officer, as quick as a flash, and with an unexpected movement whirled him over his hip; then lated him bodily, and would have desired him over the deck like a stone, if the young man, as lithe and active as he was strong, had not contrived to regain his balance by whirling himself completely round, sideways, in the other's grasp. Coming to his feet, he caught his antagonist by the throat, and a desperate struggle ensued.

Bran lon and the captain saw it, and interposed.

" What means this?" inquired the skipper.

Neither of the young men answered.

"What was the trouble about?"

Punk, who, from the carpenter's bench had witnessed the quarrel, now came aft and explained.

"I will not permit this!" cried the captain, angrily. "I will not have an officer of mine treated otherwise than respectfully by any person aboard. So, Tartar, I must confine ye in the run."

"I would rather you would not do that, captain," said Warlock. "The quarrel was a fair one. Why should you confine him?"

"For calling you a dog, sir! That's something I won't stand aboard my craft."

"The Tartar's combativation," suggested Punk, "is evidently well enveloped. His head is wide from ear to ear, showing also a large envelopment in the organ of instructiveness."

"Nonsense!" cried Blake; "just you go forward, and help stow them barrels of sparm ite."

"Ay, ay, sir! Shiver my tarry trowsers-ahoy!"

"A true specimen of the American tar; a perfect sailor, that," said Dalton, admiringly.

The minister, absorbed in his studies and his own thoughts, when in the cabin, had not heard of Punk's cowardice ashore.

"He's the biggest lubber aboard," returned the skipper.

Mary now came to his side.

" You-you are not going to hurt him?" she said.

" Hurt who ?"

" Tamerlane."

Warlock, turning upon Lis heel, walked to the lee-rail, and good uneasily watching Mary, who, while she acknowledged that she thought the Tartar was most to blame, begged the captain not to confine him.

This she would have done in behalf of a perfect stranger, cult Warlock construed every word into an expression of pe-

The captain, however, would not be turned from his purpose. The steward brought up handcuffs, and as the Tartar did not know what they were, the skipper found it an easy task to slip them over the young man's wrists.

The prisoner was then conducted to the run, and the hatch bed ted above him. As it fell clicking, Warlock turned to sec tears in Mary's eyes.

The Lext day, learning that his allowance consisted of his but cold water and sea-biscuits, she persuaded the capain to give him better. Warlock had heard her, and and was a prey to jealousy. Toward evening he drew the young girl aside.

" Mary," said he, solemnly, " tell me plainly if you do not love me ?"

" Love you? Oh, Harry! how can you doubt that?"

To this the young man made no reply, for several minutes; then he said that he believed she felt an interest in Tamer-lane.

Mary blushed, and frankly acknowledged that she did.

- "B."," added she, " it is entirely different from my feelings toward you: that you must know."
 - " He las an influence over you?"
 - "Yes; but not like yours."
 - "What is it like, then?"

"Oh, Harry, you press me too close! How can I answer such a question? I could not explain the influence. It is peculiar: something I never felt before!"

This speech stabled Warlock's heart like a knife. He governed himself, however; then, encircling Mary's waist by said:

- " You must prove that you love me!"
- " Prove it!" sac exclaimed, reproachfully.
- " Yes: by marrying me!"
- " And have I not promised?"
- "Yes; but what I request is that you marry me now-at once—here, about I ship!"
- "A marriage abound a ship! Why, Harry, who ever

"It can be done. We have a minister here."

"Oh, I could not think of it!"

Nevertheless Harry, with true eloquence, soon brought her over to his wishes. She consented to marry him aboard ship, provided her papa was willing.

Accordingly Brandon was at once consulted. He thought they had better wait, but saw no serious objection. As to Dalton, he was delighted.

"A bridal at sea—something truly novel," he remarked, smiling and rubbing his hands.

Punk, standing at the wheel, grinned and rolled his quid.

"Ay, ay, sir! Shiver me, novel it is!" he remarked, stretching his long legs.

"Ah, here he is again! our son of Neptune!" ejaculated Dalton, playfully patting the speaker upon the back.

"Beg your honor's pardon!" said Punk. "Ahoy, sir, ahoy!"

The news of the intended marriage soon found its way to the captain.

"A wedding aboard ship," said he, " is something which I've never heard of before. I don't see any objection, however, providing the parties consarned be willing, and the bride has a gown to wear for the occasion."

The wedding-day was fixed upon for the morrow. The crew forward hearing that they would be invited aft to witness the ceremony, soon were busy, washing out shirts and trowsers. Punk polished his number ten slippers until they shone like patent leathers, and donned a pair of flowing duck pants, measuring nearly two yards round the bottoms.

Old Tom Burke was the only man who did not seem pleased with the idea of a wedding aboard ship.

"It's no use, mates," said he, "there'll be no luck in this thing, any more than in t'others, while there's a Jony in the craft. Mark my words, the wedding will be misfortunate."

The Kanakas and Portuguese looked gloomy. "Think we have wreck—go to bottom?" inquired one.

"P'raps so, or even something worse; no tellin' when there's a Jony aboard."

Next morning a clear, cloudless sky, and a light breeze seemed to belie the prophesy of old Burke. A more pleasant day could not be imagined. The blue waves rolled tinkling, shining all over, as if sown with stars, and the porpoises went leaping merrily along, past the vessel. Alow and aloft, the broad sails, just filled by the breeze, spread their snowy bosoms, casting graceful, swaying shadows over deck and water. All hands were early on deck, neatly dressed in blue and duck pants, spotless clean shirts and jackets. Aft, some men were engaged in adorning the quarter-deck with flag, arranged in graceful fistoons, and a snow-white canvas cancery, stretching from the top of the round-house to the larb and davits. Old Barke was one of those thus employed. His face was gloomy, and his eyes shone with a significant expression, which the captain could not help noticing.

" Come, my man, what ails you?"

"There's a Jonah in this craft," answered Tom, "and that's going to affect the wedling."

"Nonsense; you are very foolish."

* Never min I, sir," sad the old sailor; "you'll see!"

The preparations soon were completed. After breakfast the equin summoned all hands aft. They were ranged on the lee side of the deck, where their dark faces, side by side, contrasted curiously with the white of the canopy above their loads. The minister, with the Bible before him, stood nor the equals, writing for the young couple to come up.

Nor was he obliged to wait long. Mary and Warlock soon on, reel on dock, the bride wearing the wolding raiment which had been used by her mother, and which the young girl had brought to sea with her, in her trunk. She looked surpassingly lovely with the delicate have barely hiding the from the around her bright dark hair, drooping in heavy masses. Just as she stepped on dock some person emerged from the steer, which the track the Tarter, whom the captain had released from conductment, a couple of hours previously. A plastly has rest bon his face, his lips were compressed, and see trendly his every lamb. Mostley his will place, Mary threely docate. Warlock felt her arm shake upon his own.

He lie his lies and a sharp per g shot through him. Controlling his facilities, however, he endeavered to seem picased and harpy, as he led the blacking girl before Dalton.

Brandon stepped up, kissed his daughter, then put her hand in Warlock's.

"Proceed," he said, in a husky voice, which plainly revealed his emotion.

The words making Warlock and Mary man and wife, soon were pronounced. The Tartar, with gloomy brow, watched the couple as they were about descending through the companionway. At the same moment the deafening cheers of the scamen fell upon his cars. He scowled, breathed a heavy sigh, and walking over to windward, stood gazing down into the water, evidently indulging a disagreeable reverie. An instant after he heard the captain's voice.

"Well, Tom Burke, you perceive that the wedding passed off without any trouble, after all."

"Ay, ay, sir," answered the old tar, who, perched upon the quarter-rail, had for some time been watching a cloud of the size of a little snow-ball, which was coming up in the horizon to windward. "Ay, ay sir, so far; but do you see that thing?" pointing to the cloud.

"Ay, ay," repeated the captain. "What of it?"

"We're goin' to have a screamer, sir! Somethin' that'll make the old craft shiver, as she never shivered before."

The captain knew too well the skill of old sailors in fore telling a temptest not to disrespect the words of Barke. He procured his glass, and carefully scrutinized the cloud.

Just then the steward thrust his head through the com-

" Dinner ready, sir I'

The dinner being a bridal repast, had been got up with unusual care, and the skipper had looked forward to it over since breakfast, with no little eagerness. Now, however, to searcely headed the announcement. There was a look about the approaching cloud which he did not like. It was girled by a yellowish ring, and seemed to grow larger every moment.

The rapidity of its approach exceeded any thing the captain had ever witnessed. In ten minutes it had come from the verge of the horizon almost to the zenith.

"Dinner, sir," repeated the steward.

"Ay, ay, in a moment," answered Blake, sharply.

As he spoke a sudien rearing, crackling, humming noise was heard. Right to windward, scarcely five ships' lengths of, the white water rose into great sheets of driving spray. Several drips were whirled into the skipper's face.

At this down he jumped, his voice ringing through the Ship I se a we be a ing through timber.

"Harls by the halliarls! In with royals and to'-gallant-Kanakas, Portuguese and whites ran, swarming all over the ship. Blocks creeked, yards began to move, and canvas to roll up.

"Lively! lively, men! Hard-a-port, there, at the wheel!" As the Leimsman obeyed a noise like the crashing of a landed liver forest trees, smote upon the ears of all.

Down went the ship upon her beam-ends, with the water pouring, tumbling over her weather-rail in huge torrents, while she flow along upon her course with the speed of lightning.

Scon the force of the gale leveled the vast ocean as flat as a marble floor, hissing, seething, roaring with the din of many than lers, it stretched for away, dimly away into the blinding stray with which the air was filled. Through this spray the gham of phosphorus shone like shooting stars, while, linked with the scintillant light, might have been observed little electric chains of fire, circular round and round, here and there, like winged serpents.

The force of the gale was terrific. Sheets and tacks gave way, some of the canvas was torn to tatters, while the masts in Thed like willows, creaking and snapping as if about going over.

The brital dinner was of course interrupted. The sudden roll of the vessel to be word had thrown plates and platters to the dick, where they were shattered into fragments. The officers harried up, to help issue or lers, and to pull the sails, as the crew were short-handed.

With hamming keel the vessel tore along upon her course, rolling, pinning, pitching with a violence which threatened to carry away her spars every moment. Old Burke, who had just come down from aloft, shook his head.

"I knowed that wedding wouldn't come off all right, with the Jony in her" muttered he, in a low voice.

The captain heard him.

"We will come out," said he, "without the loss of a spar."

As he spoke the vessel made a furious plunge, then up she came again, with thunder running through every timber. A crack was heard aloft; down went the maintop-gallantmast, catching in the huge topsail, and with its weight, combined with the slatting of the canvas, threatening to carry away the vest of the mast!

Aloft there, and clear that spar! thundered the skipper The sailors, however, shrugged their shoulders. No man believed he could maintain his footing on the yard, in such a blow.

Warlock, who had just been directing the man at the wheel, perceiving this, sprung to mount aloft, when the tall form of the Tartar, passing him, was in an instant seen in the rigging.

Since coming aboard ship that person had evinced such interest in nautical matters, that the captain and Brandon had taken pleasure in giving him instructions. As he was fond of going aloft, he had been shown how to furl a top-gallant-sail, and to help the men reef topsails, besides being taught to make several intricate hitches and knots. In going aloft he had shown wonderful agility. He could run up the rigging like a squirrel, could climb the lecches of the sails, and had been seen to walk out to the end of a yard, that is, on top of a yard, while the ship was rolling and pitching on long, heavy swells.

Now there was about the manner of the young chief a certain recklessness, a headstrong carclessness of life, which do not fail to attract the attention of all who watched him. Brandon, a man of penetration, divined the cause. He had not, of course, failed to remark the Tartar's admiration of his caugater ashore, nor the subsequent tenderness a trespect which he had shown her. With his one eye he at once read the secret of the man of the coast, and felt much sympathy for him on that very account.

It grieved him much to behold the youth now fling himself so heedlessly into the rigging, scarcely holding on to the shrouds as he went aloft. All on deck watched him with anxiety, expecting every moment to see him dashed headlong into the raging waters. With a rope, containing a bowline hitch, he was soon upon the topsail-yard, which he now carelessly strallied. Thus seated he was one moment lifted for up, apparently to the very skies, and the next carried away down into a watery abyss.

Even Tom Barke shrugged his shoulders, and said that the Tartar could never come back alive.

Fortune often favors during. The young chief, dextrously throwing his rope, caught it round the end of the careening spar, then, pulling downward, cleared the sail in a moment, the shattered mass of wood falling alongside.

To return to the deck was, with the adventurer, the work of a moment. Down he came, by means of a backstay, which he held on to quite carelessly, as if not caring much whether he was thrown overboard or not.

'Ay, ay, now, Tartar!" exclaimed Captain Blake, advancing at lights highlis hand. "You've got pluck and no mistake!"

Warlock, too, filled with the natural admiration of a daring man for during, and for the moment forgetting the ill-technic existing between him and the young Tartar, also held out his hand.

Tumerlane, however, drew haughtily back, refusing the proffer I hand with a gesture of proud disdain. At this, Warl &k simply turned upon his heel, and walked away indifferently. As he did so he saw Mary peering through the comparionway, and knew by the sparkle of her eyes that she had seen the performance of the chief.

"Herry," she said, admiringly, "what a brave deed !"

"It was a brave deel," Warlock frankly answered. 'Dut yet had better go below now," he added, as a cloud of spray flew over the young girl.

She object after which Warlock assisted the men doct furling the top-all, which could now be easily stowed, as the gale had slightly abated.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE DISAPPEARANCE.

THE gale kept abating gradually, and finally the captain redered the fore and mizzen-topsail to be loosened.

At that moment, however, a man on the fore-yard sung out, "Land O! right ahead!"

"Never mind the topsail!" roared the captain. "Stand by to wear ship!"

The men obeyed; tacks and sheets soon were whipping about, and round came the ship. Before she could gather way on her new course, she was less than forty fathoms from the shore, a long, oval-shaped island, bordered by shrubbery-covered rocks, and with a beach as white as snow, above which the tall cocoanut was seen, gracefully waving.

Leaning over the side, the captain now observed a number of little eddies, whirling swiftly round and round, betokening a strong current. This current drew the vessel rapidly shoreward, in spite of all the skipper's exertions.

"We will have to anchor," said he, and gave the required order.

As he always made a practice of carrying a ready anchor, the ponderous mass of iron soon, with a loud splash, descended into the sea, and went roaring down to the bottom, where, luckily, it found good holding-ground. Still the vescel would drag in course of time, so the captain also had a cable bent on to the sheet-anchor, which was also let go.

"Now then, we're safe, for the present," said the skipper, rubbing his hands.

"Ay, ay, safe it is, sir," said Punk, as he went rolling past, on his way forward.

"Where did you come from?" inquired Blake, staring upon the man as if he thought he had just risen from his grave.

Punk's face was covered with a curious mixture of tar and tow, especially the region about the nose.

"Where did I come from, sir?" be inquired. "Why, shiver me, captain, but that's a strange question, begging your pardon, for you to ask. I was aloft, helping to furl the main-topsail."

"Lie!" exclaimed the young Tartar, who stood not far off, and his lip curled with contempt. "Saw you during the storm in the steerage, among rigging, with your nose against tar-bucket ?"

At this the whole quarter-deck rung with laughter, and Punk's long legs were seen whirling round and round, like a pullic-wheel, as he darted forward.

Dalton, coming up soon after, and beholding Punk seated on the fore-yard, with both hands clasping the mast, and his long legs dangling down, was penetrated with profound admiration.

"A beautiful sight," he remarked, turning with a smile to the captain. "That son of Neptune, even when the dangers of the storm are over, can not, like us landsmen, content himself in staying here below, but must mount to the dizzy spar between sea and sky, and there fix his place of rest."

The captain rolled his quid, opened his eyes very wide, then, grinning from ear to ear, walked off with a mysterious nod.

Dalton then made his way forward, and jumping upon the knighthead, with his hands under his coat-tails, the following colloquy took place between him and Pank:

"Do you not, my friend," said Dalton, "find it disagreeable, so far up in the air, on a high mast? I should think it would make your head turn round."

"Governor," answered Punk; "ahoy, sir, al. y; we sallors are not troubled with dizziness, your honor."

To show his recklessness, Pank, carefully holding on to the thest with both hands, began to dance a fundango on the yard, his highest dying about like a windmill.

"Ha! ha! ha! haghed Dalton. "Now really that is a performance. Why, I could not believe it possible if it were not passing before my very eyes."

"Shiver my turry tollights!" shouted Punk; "ahoy there aboy! Whales of the he binnac'e."

"Oh, Jear me!" sighed Dalton; "such men are the glory of our marine—such men fought in the Constitution under the gallant Paul Jones. My friend, did you ever hear of Paul Jones?"

"Hear of him!" said Punk, with dignity; "every American seaman, your honor, wears him in his heart. Hours! hooray! hooray!" waving his tarpaulin round his head. " If we can not do better, we'll sink along-ide!"

"That is inspiring," said Dalton, his eyes glowing. "R. . y, it seems to me as if I could hear the crashing of the road-shot through the frigate's timbers!"

At that moment, something struck Punk on the top of the head. It was nothing but a ball of spun-yarn, contemptionally dropped upon the pretender by Tom Burke, who was fir above him, repairing a foot-rope. The long-legged "sulor" was much frightened, but his face being just then turned side ways, the minister, who had now jumped down from the knighthead, and was moving aft, did not observe his terror.

About this time a whale-boat, to enable the men to repair some damages done to the rudder, was lowered astern. The workmen were under the superintendence of the third-mate, who, chancing to look up, saw the Tartar above him, evidently watching his operations with much interest.

- " Good-afternoon, Tamerlane."
- " Good-day."
- "I see you take an interest in our work."
- " Yes."
- "How is it you were not frightened by the storm, Tartar? You certainly never were to sea before."
 - " Don't know."
 - " What ?"
- "Don't know. Feel somehow as if been on ship's deck before; must have dreamed it."
- "Ay, ay," laughe! the third-mate; "I understand, a Chinese junk, perhaps, when you were a youngster."

" Perhaps."

The Tartar seeme I to fall into a reverie. His brows were knitted, his eyes glowe I like coals.

Finally, just as the third-mate, having finished his work, was about mounting to the deck, leaving the boat still lying astern, Tamerlane looked up.

" Whale-boat good boat?"

" Ay, ay."

" Sail fast ?"

" Ay, ay."

- "With only one man in him, how you do? How you spork boat?"
 - "You'd have to scull, if you didn't have a sail."

" Show how you mean."

"With pleasure," and jumping into the boat with the Tartar the officer showed his companion how to scull with a steering-oar.

The Tartar watched him silently, then took the oar himself, and kept practicing until he was quite an adept in the business.

"Wily, Tamerlane, I never saw anybody learn as fast at you do."

The Tartar seemed insensible to the compliment, but kept working away at the oar, as if determined to perfect himself in the use of it.

"Going to leave boat here all night?"

"Ay, ay; we haven't quite completed our work; I shall set Tomerlane, dropping the oar, now sprung on deck, in time to see Mary, who had come up a moment before, moving toward the companionway. Night was darkening over the deck, but the eyes of the two might have been seen to shine as their glances met.

"What is this strange influence that the man has over me," muttered the young wife.

As she spoke, she saw the Tartar bound lightly toward or. He seized her hand, and pressed upon it an earnest kiss her, before the in lightly toward and disappeared in the gloom.

Witen Mary entered the cabin she found Dulton seated with the captain and Brandon, before a small table.

"Yes," the minister was saying, "I should really like to go ashore to-morrow. Will you be of the party, Mrs. War-lock," he added, rising and offering her his seat. "I have no doubt we will have a pleasant time, picking some of the many curious shells which can be seen from our deck, strewn along the beach."

"Yes, sir, I should like to go."

"Very well," said Warlock, who just then entered; "and," he added, laughing, "we will see if any thing happens to interrupt our party, as it did to interrupt our dinner."

"I trust not," murmured Mary.

She shuddered as she spoke, and turned slightly pale.

"What is the matter? You are ill!" exclaimed War-lock.

"No," she answered, smiling; "not ill, but, I don't know why, I feel strangely uneasy."

At this Brandon looked up, his one eye gleaming anxiously His wife had always been subject to what are termed presentiments, and he had reason to think that Mary had inherited this peculiarity from her mother.

He mastered his emotion, and said calmly:

"The excitement during yesterday's storm was too much for you; you had better retire."

Mary, however, shook her head, and said she would sit up awhile. Her husband endeavored to dispel the strango melancholy which seemed to rest upon her like a shadow, but all in vain.

Finally she retired to her little room, which adjoined that of Warlock. The young man, while kissing her, and bidding her good-night, could perceive that she trembled.

After she was gone, he told Brandon that he feared she was "No, I guess not," answered the father, uneasily; "she probably will be as bright as a May morning by to-morrow."

While lying at anchor in port the crews of whalers generally stend what are termed anchor-watches. An anchorvatch is one which is kept by a single man forward and another—usually a boat-steerer—aft. This was the case on the present occasion; the man forward being Tom Burke, and the one aft a Kanaka harpooner, with a huge head, much given to dozing away his time at night, under all circumstances. Wrapped in his pea-jacket, Burke was pacing the deck, when he thought he heard a noise as of a splash, and a singular gasping, astern.

He paused and listened, but not hearing the noise repeated, cencio be that it was caused by a shark or some other fish hearing ont of the water. The hour was about eleven o'clock, the next was dark, and there was some fog on the water. Buke glanced ait and astern, but he could see nothing, and to continued his walk. Not long had he paced the deck! when he felt a hand upon his arm, and turning beheld Brandon, his one eye gleaming like a blood-red star, in the light of the lantern hang up in the fore-rigging.

"I have just waked from a bad dream," he said, in a hoarse voice; "I hope nothing has gone wrong."

Burke looked up, shaking his head gloomily.

"It's no use, sir," he said; "for, although nothing has gone wrong since I came on deck, yet there is no telling how long it will be before there will, seein' as you, sir, are in the craft."

"Pakaw, man, not cured of your foolish superstition yet?"

"Feelish! haven't it come true, sir? Ain't we had misfortune ever since we set sail?"

"Yes; but that was merely chance; I, of course, had nothing to do with it."

"Might as well call every thing chance; it's queer chance, sir, what's happened!"

"Well, at any rate," said Brandon, "I trust that at last our troubles are ended."

"No, sir; only one way-for you to go ashore."

" You are mad."

"While you're in the craft, there'll be no luck; you darter may yet be drowned, for all you know, if you stay aboard."

"My daughter?" exclaimed Brandon, anxiously; then, sifling a strange, unaccountable feeling, he replied: "You meet ril yourself of those foolish notions." He added: "You say the whale-boat is still astern? That is carclessness; call some of your shipmates and hook on to the vessel; we must hold it up."

Burke obeyed; four men went aft to execute Brandon's order, when, to their astonishment, they discovered that the boat was gone.

"I knowed it," muttered Tom Burke, emphatically; "I knowed that something bed would come of an order from the Jony."

The men returned with the news to Brandon, who, much surprised in his turn, ran aft to find that the men had spoken the truth.

He stooped, and pulled up a remnant of the boat-warp dangling down.

" Bring a lantern," said he.

It was brought, when the second-mate held up the warp before Burke.

It had been severed by a knife.

- "One, or perhaps more of the crew have made off with the boat," he said.
 - " Not while I was on deck," answered Burke.

" Call all hands !"

The old sailor obeyed, and up came the men, grundling at being disturbed. When they were ranged before him, Brandon, with the aid of the boat-lantern, counted them, to discover that all were present!

"Strange!" he exclaimed. "Who can have cut that beat adrift? None of the officers, certainly."

"No sir," answered Burke. "Nobody aft could have done so unless it were that strong-headed fellow, Tamerlane!"

Brandon, however, smiled at this suggestion. He know that the Tartar admired his daughter, and would not believe that he willingly would quit the girl whom he had followed out to sea, in preference to remaining with his will tribe

Unable to fathom the mystery, and therefore concluding to postpone further investigation until the following morning, he went below, and endeavored to compose himself to sleep. For a long time he lay awake, trouble I with a strange, uneasy feeling to which he had long been a stranger. Toward morning he fell into a light slumber, from which he was finally waked by an earnest shake upon the shoulder.

He opened his eyes to see Warlock. The face of the young man was pale and haggard, his eyes wild, his whole frame trembled.

- " For God's sake, what is the matter?"
- "Gone !" gasped Warlock. "Gone !"
- "Gone? Who?"
- "Mary, my wife! my wife! Oh, God, sir! Oh, God?"
- "Speak! What mean you!" exclaimed Brandon, springing with a bound to the deck.

"She is gone!" repeated Warlock, with a half-stiffed solu "Where—God only knows! I waked early: I rose, and when ready to go on deck, knocked at her door. There we no response: I opened the door, which, to my surprise, I found ajar, and—her berth was empty!"

Branden, almost maddered by the story he heard, followed the speaker to Mary's room, to discover the truth of what Warlock had said. The berth was empty, but Mary's dress was gone, betokening to the father's agitated mind that she had departed in a leisurely manner—had stopped to dress.

The two men now made their way on deck, where they found the officers all talking over the mysterious disappearance Warlock had informed them of it, and they were vainly on eavering to conjecture the cause.

A disegrecable thought had for some time seemed to disturb the mind of the skipper, who stood, rolling his quid uneasity.

When Brandon came up he caught the bereaved father by the hand.

"I am serry, Brandon, blasted sorry for you, and for you, Warlock, too!"

Then, drawing the secon l-mate aside, he whispered:

" Tile Turtur hasn't been seen this morning?"

Branken started: the blood faintly rushed to his heart: for a moment be was so indignant that he could have knocked the captain down.

"You don't mean to imply-"

"I nen that she sart'inly has gone off with him! be.
what I will saly or not I of course ain't able to say. From what I know of her, as a nice, worthy gal, do you see, I do 't taick she would do any thing wrong."

The captain had meant to speak low enough for Warlock not to hear; but, unfortunately he had, during his long experience, acquired a rude habit of talking loud, and every word he uttered fell distinctly on the ears of every person present.

An arrow seemed to pierce the young man's heart; searcely knowing what he did, he sprung to seize the captain by the throat.

"It is false!" he cried. "She would never—never—have done that!"

Brandon interposed between the young man and the skipper.

"Hold!" he exclaimed, "let there be no quarreling! God knows the matter is bad enough without that!"

"No," said the skipper, "we should rather try to devise means for overtaking the Tartar!"

"Ay, ay, down with the larboard boat! down! down with it!" howled Warlock, almost distracted. "I will go at once!"

"Calm yourself, young man!" said Dalton, now coming forward. "You may feel confident that you can eventually overtake your wife, and also that she has been forced away!"

"Of course she has!" cried Brandon. "Let no man dare to say to me that my daughter went willingly!" he added, his one eye glowing with lurid light. "And now we had better go about our business at once. The Tartar can not as yet have proceeded very fir."

Hung up above the beams on the quarter-deck, there was a ship's cutter which the crew had picked up when within a day's sail of the Western Islands. This boat the captain thought would be just the thing for the pursuit, as it carried a large mainsail and jib, and was built so light and sharp, that its speed could not be less than that of a whale-boat, which is deemed the fastest sailer, for its size, of any craft that is made. The cutter was taken down and lowered alongside; then some breakers of fresh water, with provisions enough to last for a week, were stowed in it. Soon after the rail was also placed across the thwarts, together with some good oars made expressly for the boat, months before, by the carpenter. The captain had taken this pains because he was a careful skipper, and had foreseen that the boat, at some future time, would come in use. When it was made ready all hands were deck.

"Men," said the captain, "you have doubtlessly heard of what has happened. Now I want volunteers for the cutter, which is to go in chase of the Tartar. Who'll volunteer?"

There was no response; not a man stepped from the line.

" Lively there !" cried the skipper, impatiently.

Still not a man budged.

The captain became angry.

"What!" he exclaimed, "are you all such a pack of cowards that you are not willing even to run a little risk for the sake of a husband and a father!"

Tom Burke stepped forth as spokesman for his shipmates.

- "We pity them too, sir, as much as it is possible; but, do you see, we don't like venturing with a Jony in the boat the Lat him remain aboard, and we'll volunteer to a man!"
 - " Nonsense!" cried the irritated skipper.
- "Bezzin' your parlon, sir!" began Burke, but the captain checked him with an impatient wave of the hand.
- "You shall go! I'll have no such doings aboard my ship! I'll pick out the crew myself. You, Burke for the first man."

Burke shook his head gloomily.

- "I never refused orders and I won't now: but just be so good, captain, as to send my chest, with the duds in it, home to my little grandchild, Ellen Burke, that lives at New Bedford!"
 - "Why, you old shark, what mean you?"
- "I mean that them that goes in that boat, under a Jonah, will never come back?"

As he sail this he jumped into the boat.

"Nov ther's a brave man for you!" cried the skipper and when he comes back he shan't go unrewarded."

The next man chosen was Punk, who, with pretended har illocal, on he ring his name pronounced, stepped forth, too hed his enormous tarpaulin, and bowed, scraping the deck with his left foot.

"Good!" exclained Dalton, rubbing his hands with a cheerful sir, and patting Warlock upon the back. "With such men you need have no fear about recovering your bride!"

"Shiver my tarry to'ligths!" exclaimed Punk, as he went rolling along to the waist.

"The light-hearted carelessness with which your true son of the ocean faces danger is certainly remarkable!" cried the minister, with unbounded admiration.

Meanwhile Punk, trembling in his number tens, shivering all over with a feeling of dread, threw up his long legs, and lowly went down the ship's side into the boat.

The rest of the crew being selected, with gloomy fees is took their stations upon their thwarts. Before the boat is the ship's side, the captain put into Brandon's hand a small pocket-compass.

"You see how much faith I have in the safe return of this boat, when I trust in it this compass, which I prize more than any thing I ever had, as it was a present from my maternal grandfather?"

A faint cheer was the response, but it was evident that it was forced; there was no heart in it!

"Give way!" howled Warlock, in a voice that rung sharp . on the ear; "give way."

The crew, composed, besides Burke, Punk and the two officers, of four Kanakas and as many Portuguese, laid back to their oars and made the boat jump.

A breeze, blowing from land, soon after, suggested the setting of mainsqil and jib. This was done, when away went the cutter with redoubled speed. By sundown land and ship were out of sight, but nothing of the fagitive had as yet been seen.

"We may be on the wrong course, who can tell?" exclaimed Brandon, despairingly.

There was a low murmur among the crew.

" Of course, with a Jonah in the bout!"

"Silence!" roared Brandon; "not another word of such foolishness!"

With sullen faces the men continued to ply their oars. Darkness soon closed round them, when Brandon permitted them to rest, keeping his cruft running along as fast as his mainsail and jib would permit.

In the course of haif an hour, the moon rose, and silver aght glittered far along the waves. Still there was nothing visible of the fugitive boat. The wind kept freshening every moment: finally it roared a gale.

"Now, then, our time has come!" muttered Burke, scarcely above a whisper. "No luck while the Jonah is with us!"

Punk heard him, and trembled so that he could scarcely sit upon his thwart.

From the seas came rolling and tumbling over both ginmais, when Punk kept jumping up and down in a very thichtened, unsailorlike manner. Brandon, angry at his behavior, rapped him over the head with a paddle, and ordered him to remain quiet.

"Ay, ay, sir-quiet it is !" answered Punk, his teeth chattering.

The gale continued heavy, several times almost swamping the cutter.

"My God! if Mary be out in such a sea, what hope for her, with that inexperienced Tartar to guide the boat?" cried Warlock.

"True enough!" answered Brandon, full of the most dis mad foreboilings. "May heaven help my child!"

"Light O!" howled old Burke, who, with son'-wester immed over his brow, sat in the bow, helping to keep a lookout!

Yes, there, sure enough, was a light, far ahead, gleaming through the durkness. Just as Brandon was about to take the Leavings of it, it was seen no more!

"Singular!" exclaimed Warlock, "look sharp for it, men, again!"

It was no use: the light was not again seen!

"Of course not," muttered Burke, "it was some will-o'-the wisp! Them kind o' things is often around where there's Jonys!"

Crash! came a heavy sea at this juncture, rolling over the last, and almost swamping it. There was a cracking sound, and it was soon discovered that the vessel had sprung a bad leak.

Burke plugged it up with his jacket, and some canvas, as well as he could, but the water still kept coming in so fast that one man was obliged to constantly bail out.

Toward morning the gale abated, and now a thick fog settled upon the sea.

"Fog-gale-leak!" muttered a Kanaka, between his teeth. "What else expec' with Jonah?"

A warning murmur, circulating among his shipmates, proclaimed that they shared his feelings. Brandon scowled flercely, his one eye blazing with a threatening expression.

When night came, the wind had hauled round, and the cutter was running along close-hauled. One of the Kanakas remarking that they might as well return to the ship, while the wind was fair, was overheard by the rest. Instantly whispers were exchanged.

"Come now, no mutiny, mates!" exclaimed Burke.

Even as he spoke, however, the eight Kanakas and Portuguese, with one simultaneous cry, rose, brandishing their Laives, and prepared for a rush upon Brandon.

"Kill! kill!" they exclaimed. "Jonah must die! No good-luck while here."

Brandon's eye shot fire. He drew a revolver, and quietly pointed it at the head of the man nearest to him

"Advance one step, and you are a dead dog!"

Warlock, who was also armed, stood ready to assist his father-in-law. Burke also drew his knife to assist the whites; but Punk, slipping over the boat's gunwale as quickly and easily as a greased barrel, held on to the bow with both hands, keeping his head out of sight as much as possible.

Two resolute men, well armed, can accomplish much. The mutineers sullenly sat down, and as sullenly promised not to make another attempt. This promise Brandon forced from them under the very muzzle of his revolver.

Soon after a pair of long legs flew up into the boat with gapping sound. They were Punk's, as their worthy owner drew himself back into the cutter.

Nearly at the same moment the light was again seen, this time bearing far away off the lee-bow. It continued burning etendily for about twenty minutes, when it was extinguished. Brandon I ad now taken the bearings of it, and directed his boat toward it. He kept steadily along on his new course until daylight, when the beat's bow was heard to strike against comething. The vessel was brought up into the wind, and now stooping, old Burke fished up an oar from the sea. It had a blue band about the middle, and the letter A upon the handle, near the top.

"One of our oars!" exclaimed the old seaman. "That oar came from the waist-boat."

"Ay, ay!" cried Brandon, joyfully, "from my boat. We are on the right track, Warlock, thank heaven!"

An hour after, a fog-bank ahead clearing, land was discovered about a league distant. It was a mere strip, resembling one gray rock, apparently containing neither vegetation nor water.

Burke sprung upon the bow, scrutinizing it closely.

"There's something on it!" he exclaimed, "but whether they be birds or what, is more'n I can tell, so far off."

"To your oars, men!" howled Brandon. "Something tells me that we will there find those we seek."

The boat, beneath the strokes of the seamen, aided by the mainsail, seemed fairly to jump.

It soon was within twenty fathoms of the desert-island, which now was discovered to be not over one hundred yards in length and about twenty-five in breadth. It was evidently of volcanic origin, was composed of rugged masses of light-colored, porous rock, through which the wind blowing, produced a weird, singular harmony, something like that made by hollow reeds. The men looked sharp, but could see no living object upon the island, although Burke insisted that his eyes had not decrived him:

Meanwhile the cutter roared on her way, until within about ten fathous of the shore, when there was a crash, the timbers of the boat parted, and over she went, spilling out receipents upon a submerged rock. Punk fell upon his mal, his larg legs projecting for up in the air. When with the rest he regimed his balance, he almost gasped in his term. Brank a, however, soon quieted his fears with the assertion that the water was not much more than ankle deep, between the simben rock and the shore. He ordered the men to drag the wreck with them to land.

"Now," exclaimed Warlock, when they were ashore, "all kepe of fin ling my bride is at an end!"

He sat down, howing his face on his bands, when he was roused by an exclamation from Burke, who had climbed an elevated spur, and now stood, pointing toward the other side of the island.

All hands were soon on the rock, when, sure enough, they beheld the wreck of a boat, lying in a miniature bay, formed by a curve in the shore. They hastened to it, and discovered that it was the waist-boat of the Albatross, the one which the Tartar lad made off with. Brandon and Warlock exchanged glances, turning deathly pale. To them it now seemed plain a that the girl and her abductor had been lost in the late gale, after which the fragments of the boat had drifted ashore.

While indulging this gloomy reflection, they noticed that a Kanaka, who had not followed them, was stooping upon his hands and knees, about the center of the island, evidently watching something he had discovered, with the most eager attention. Soon he sprung up, and his shipmates saw him motioning to them. They hurried to the spot, which was a high rock of rough, conical shape, with an opening in the top. Peering through this opening, Brandon now beheld the two persons he and Warlock were in search of, Mary and the Tartar, far down beneath them in a rocky chamber, the entrance to which evidently was in the side of the rock.

Brandon and Warlock were not long in discovering this entrance; it was in the side of the rock facing the sea, and was just large enough to admit a human body. The interior of the passage was blackened from top to bottom, betokening that the roaring flames of a terrific volcano had once passed through it, and formed an outlet at the opening or crater at the top.

Hurrying along the passage, Warlock and Brandon soon were in the rocky cell containing the objects of their search. Mary was seated in one corner of the apartment, weeping and sobbing, while, not far from her, stood Tamerlane, leaning against the side of the cave, his arms folded over his breast, his eyes downcast. Both turned on hearing the footsteps of the new-comers.

" My husband' Thank God!" exclaimed Mary, springing up and rushing toward him.

The young man, however, having made straight for the Fartar, she missed him, and was caught in her father's arms.

"Speak! my child, tell me what this means? Your going

He checked himself, as a savage cry ran through the cave. Warlock had caught the Tartar by the throat, and the man of the coast, with an exclamation of rage had drawn his knife. It is interposed, and several of the Portuguese assisted in hearing the two apart.

" Make Lim fast! Bind his hands!" exclaimed Warlock.

Tamerlane struggled fiercely, but in a short time he was a bound and helpless prisoner.

Then, turning to his bride, Warlock, holding out his arms, received her upon his bosom.

Explanations followed. Mary had thrown herself down without undressing, and fallen into a sleep on the night of her disappearance, when she was suddenly wakened to find herself in the arms of a man. Bewildered, thinking that a serious catastrophe had happened, she thought at first that the man who held her was her husband, come to rescue her from some impending peril. Soon, however, she discovered her mistake; the light of the lantern in the state-room, falling upon the form of the person who held her, revealed Tamerlane. She was about to scream out, when, putting a hand over her mouth, he leaped with her out of the cabin window—those in the Albatross were unusually large—into the whale-level astern, and the next moment she felt the boat gliding out to sea in the current, which, at low water, took that direction from the island.

When out of sight of the ship, Tamerlane released his tristner, telling her that he loved her, and begging her not wolfeet going with him to some distant island, where he sai i they could both be happy.

She replied by cries for help, but all to no purpose. Sha was too for from the ship to be heard.

Then Tamerlane said that he hoped he could make her love him after a while. He took his place at the steering our, and his manner was, from that moment, perfectly respectful to her. He did not even offer to touch or hiss her

Next morning, land and ship were out of sight, but Mary looked eagerly for a sail, hoping that she might be picked up, and thus rescued from her captor. No sail came in sight; she refused to eat a mouthful, begging her captor, as she had legged him from the first, to take her back to the ship. He refused, keeping the boat on her course until night, when a gale came up, almost swamping the light vessel. It was about the n.iddle of the night, she judged, when there was a crash, as the whale-boat struck upon a rock, and was broken to frag ments. The Tartar seized her in a firm grasp, and waded with her to this island. He then struck a light in the boat lantern, which he had contrived to save, and discovered the cave, into which he urged his prisoner. Here he had left her alone to go in search of food, and to secure, if possible, some of the provisions which had fallen out of the larat.

He did not return until morning, when he presented himself with a bag of sea-biseuits, which he had found, and begged her to partake of the food.

CHAPTER IX.

PERIL.

BRANDON now stepped to the Tartar's side.

"Young man," said he, "you have acted in a strange manner. Did you not know it was wrong to make off with my daughter, the wife of a man whom she tenderly loves?"

"Wrong, no!" commenced Tamerlane emphatically. "Perhaps you white men call it so, but my tribe, when they want girs, take her—carry her away. From the first moment I saw the white girs, I love. I love her hair, more bright and shining than the ocean grass—I love her eyes that sparkle like the bright pebble in the white sand—I love all—all of the beautifut sea-girl."

Mary heard these words; her husband was pained to see her andle.

"What!" he exclaimed, "can you feel thus toward him. after the way he has treated you?"

Tears came to the eyes of the young bride.

"Before I married you, Harry," she said, " I told you that Tamerlane had over me an influence for which I could not accaunt."

"I know you did," he answered, sighing

Brandon, meanwhile, fixing his one cyt sternly on the Tar car, said: .

" Behave yourself hereafter, know that what you did was wrong, and never undertake it again."

" No, I will not promise. If I have chance I carry seagirl away. Perhaps learn to love me in time," he added. thoughtfully.

Brandon was a quick-tempered man, and, for the moment, his indignation mastered him. He raised his fist to strike Tamerlane, when, meeting the latter's glance, a strange, unaccountable feeling came over him, and the hand dropped powerless at his side.

Astonished at himself, he walked musingly away. He was still thinking, when upon his shoulder he felt a light touch, and turning beheld his daughter.

"Well, papa," she said, "had we not better set about our return to the ship at once?"

Brandon started There could be no return to the ship un'il a boat was provided. He informed Mary of the de struction of the cutter.

"What can we do?" she inquired, turning pale.

Brancien mused a moment, then beckoned to Warlock, who promptly came.

"Do you think we could fashion, with the remains of the whale-boat, any kind of a conveyance on which we could get to the ship?"

Warlock reflected a few minutes, then announced that h thought a sert of raft large enough to safely comiain one person, might be made, with a sail to waft it along Brandon was of the same opinion, and advised that they should at once go to werk. They did so, and by noon a raft with a sail had been fashioned, secured with strong ropes, from one of two coils which had been brought away in the cutter.

- "A queer craft, this," said Tom Burke; "one upon which I'd not like to ventur."
- "You will not be asked to," said Brandon. "I intend to go myself; with my compass, I think I may contrive to reach the ship, when I can make known the situation of those I leave behind me, and bring the vessel to their rescue."

"That'll never be!" muttered Burke, solemnly; " a Jony vill never succeed in such a v'yage."

"You had better let me go," said Warlock; "I am not atraid but what I could eventually reach the ship."

"No, I must be the one to go. I have given you my daughter, and I have therefore no person who would much grieve if I were lost. It is best that I should go."

"Papa, dear, dear papa!" exclaimed Mary, tears springing to her eyes, "how can you speak thus? You knew that I should never cease to mourn your loss."

Brandon kissed her; then reiterated his determination to go. His daughter endeavored to dissuade him from his purpose, saying that she thought it best for all to remain on the little isle and stand a chance of being picked up; but he was firm.

The wind being fresh and fair, and the weather clear, at present, he thought it best to set out at once, especially as the party had not provisions enough to last them over a week.

"Why not take this chap with ye, sir?" inquired Burke, indicating Punk. The latter, on hearing these words, suddenly made a grimace and complained of a terrible pain in his stomach. Burke smiled grimly, so did Brandon, who declared that he would prefer to make his voyage alone.

you as not!" exclaimed Punk, suddenly brightening up.

"I don't want you," answered Brandon, dryly, at the same time looking wistfully at the long legs, as if thinking they would make an excellent pair of paddles.

Soon he was ready to depart. He shook hands with Warlock and embraced his daughter, then, stepping upon the raft, set sail.

Leaning upon the bosom of Warlock, no less affected than herself, Mary, with the rest of the party, watched the lessening sail until it was a mere speck; the next minute it was vailed in a light mist.

Birke, moving off with Kanakas and Portuguese, shock his head, gloomily.

"No good luck will come of his going. In my opinion we'll never see the Albatross again."

Purk following behind, overheard the remark, and trembled with vague apprehensions.

Erring the cave the party, several hours after, partook c' a sight repost, consisting of sea bisenit-three apiece-and a cup of cold water.

Wien Tamerlane's snare was put before him, he refused to eat

"Never cut white prisoner," he answered, haughtily. "Rather starve!"

Warlock, with ready chivalry, at once drew his sheathknill, and severed the cords that bound the young man.

"Thank," answered the chief, gravely, and at once proceeded to eat.

Toward night some spare rolls of canvas were brought into the cave, which was then partitioned off by a screen for the accommodation of Mary. A bed was also made for her, of the same material, with two or three pea-jackets, willingly provided by some of the crew.

The whole party with the exception of Tamerlane, who roved glo mily about the little island all night, slept well, waking at daylight much refreshed.

They were preparing breakfast, when Burke, who had been out since he waked, returned to the cave, looking very gloomy. When the breakfast was portioned out, he scarcely ate his Elare, but seemed continually broading une disagreeable subject.

Warleck asked him what was the matter, and Mary's antins, quest ming glance was turned toward him.

Then the oil turn will ply seeming to brighten up, answered: "Nothing!"

W. i. cl. however, watching him closely, was certain that s mething had happen of to disturb him. After breakfast he rose and stepped out of the cave with Mary. They had not proceeded far, when Burke touched the mate on the shoulder

"I'd jist like to speak with ye a minute," said he.

Warlock stepped aside with him, when the old tar. glanceing toward the east side of the island, said, in a whisper:

"You've seen, I suppose, sir, what Iv'e seen, about the formination of the rocks, there by the coast?"

"Certainly," answered Warlock, who had observed that the rock in question rose gradually from the edge of the sea, 'or water-line, into ridges resembling the waves. These ridges were five in number, rising one above the other, to a hight not quite equal to that of the conical rock in the center of the isle.

"Well, sir," whispered Burke, "I can swear that when we first came ashore here, them ridges numbered six."

"What? Are you sure of that? Perhaps you were mis-

"No sir; I counted 'em exact. There was six; now there's but five; one has been overflowed by the tide since our coming here /"

Warlock could not help feeling uneasy at this information. He had often heard of volcanic islands disappearing in a mysterious manner. Was not this one destined to the same fate?

He walked to the sea-side with Burke, and examined the ridges closely.

The water now was nearly half a foot above the one submerged, and half way up to the next.

"Perhaps," said the mate, "that the tide here advances and recedes. We can ascertain that by coming here toward night, and taking another look."

"Ay, ay," answered Burke, "and we'll find it the way we most dislikes to have it. The Jony is at the bottom or all our trouble?"

"Nonsense! And now, above all, Burke, let me Lantlon on, neither by word nor sign, to permit Mary or any of the rest to know of this."

"Sartainly not," replied Burke; "although all must find it out, sooner or later. In my opinion, sir, the island is doomed, and our being saved depends on whether we be picked up or not."

When Warlock joined Mary, she, with natural curiosity, showed a desire to know what the two had been saying.

The mate answered with all the composure he could master, that they had been noticing the curious formation of the rock near the sea-side.

"Oh, is that all?" she said, gayly. "I thought by Burke's gloomy manner, that some terrible discovery was made."

Warlock laughed a forced laugh, and turned the conversa tion.

Toward night he and Burke again repsired to the sea-side, when their worst fears were confirmed.

The fifth ridge from the top was overflowed. THERE WERE BUT FOUR RIDGES REMAINING.

The mate and the old sailor sat watching the tide, gradually making its way toward the next ridge, with feelings that may be imagined. They returned to the cave, and threw themselves down, but not to sleep.

It was now plain that the island must, in a few days, be overflowed.

Brandon would not reach the ship, if he should reach it at all, within three days. Three more would be occupied in the vessel's getting to the castaways. This would make six days, and there were but four ridges remaining, one ridge a day to be submerged.

The only chance for the party, was, therefore, their being picked up by some strange vessel.

Warlock was res eved to have a good lookout kept, day and night. He posted a man upon the conical rock, and also hoisted a staff for a signal. The boat-lanterns he ordered to be kept burning throughout the night, as the light, streaming up through the cruter in the top of the cave, might attract some passing vessel to the spot.

"Why all this anxiety—these preparations?" inquired Mary

Are you air it that papa will not come back ?"

Wirlick en leavored to turn the conversation, and succeeded; but Mary's mind still remained uneasy. She felt that there was something—some peculiar peril—the knowledge of which was concealed from her.

On the next day, another inspection of the ridges showed

BUT THREE REMAINING!

Warlock was leaning over to examine the overflowed pidge, when he thought he could see something shining upor

it. He stooped, securing it, and discovered that it was a little miniature in ivory, disclosing the features of a beautiful woman.

It struck the mate that he had seen that face before, though where he could not determine; the lineaments were certainly not altogether strange to him, and he continued vainly to rack his brain to remember where they had met his vision.

How came the miniature there? Certainly it could not belong to any of the castaways.

While Warlock still was examining it, Tamerlane came and claimed it.

"Mine!" he said; "dropped last night while washing here, and could not find. Glad find," he added, as Warlock gave it to him. "Old man—old friend—Tartar, my father, give it to me."

So saying, he turned and walked away.

Punk now made his appearance from the cave, followed by all the Kanakas and Portuguese. One of the latter had, for the first time since coming on the island, discovered that morning, that the ridges were being overflowed!

He had immediately repaired to the cave with the news, the result of which was the appearance of the whole party, as mentioned.

Punk was almost wild with fright. He asked Warlock, again and again, if he thought they would be picked up before the island should be overflowed.

Mary soon came to the sea-side. She was very pale, and threw herself upon her husband's bosom.

"I knew you were keeping some terrible secret from me!" she exclaimed.

Then she looked up, calmly.

"I can bear the news as well as the rest," she said, seeing; the agony, on her account, upon Warlock's face. "I am not frightened, for I hope."

Beggin' your pardon, ma'am," said old Burke, "I don't think there's much hope, secin' as a Jony is consumed in the banes. But for that we might stand a chance of bein picked up."

At this Kanakas and Portuguese began talking and gesticulating wildly. Everybody had something to say about the imper ling peril except Tamerlane, who stood with an in lifferent air, his arms folded over his bosom, gazing far out to

Next morning there were but Two RIDGES REMAINING!

Warlock set his men to work, forming, with a large stone and some canvas, a "plug" for the lower entrance of the cave, one which would be perfectly water-tight, and thus keep out the waves, when the isle should be overflowed. When the stone was ready it required four men to shove it against the stone was ready it required four men to shove it against the stone was ready it and the cracks being carefully the stopped up with canvas, the cave was rendered water-tight.

Among other articles mentioned as brought away in the cutter, and which had been saved when the vessel was stoven, were several large coils of good strong rope. There was one coil remaining after Brandon had formed his raft, and this now was found very useful. A good, strong rope-ladder was made, leading from the floor of the cave to the crater or opening in the top, which, being large enough to admit a man's leady, now served as an entrance to the apartment. This aperture must be left open at all hazards, to supply fresh air to the se in the cave. Eventually, however, the sea must mount to the crater, and pour in sheeted torrents into the cell, which it would fill in less than a quarter of an hour!

The stopping up of the lower entrance would therefore be but a postponement, perhaps of twenty-four hours, of the fate of the party, who, unless picked up before the dreaded moment, were all doome I to perish!

One—two days passed in hopeless expectation. The LAST RIPOR NOW HAD OVERFLOWED, and the man seated on the local saw all round him nothing but water, and felt him to be lived a long rolling sea struck the colling search rock, upon which he was seated.

The heavens grew dark: a gale came howling down upon the sea. The waves rolled higher and higher every moment, the s, ray flying through the opening in the top of the rock, into the cave balow.

It tell upon the bright tresses of Mary's hair, as she nestled upon her husban?'s breast. She was pale and sad, yet she endeavored to bear up with becoming fortitude, while see the wind's terrific howling.

Louder and wilder raged the storm every moment. Sobs

"Do you see any thing yet?—any sign of a sail?" querical the mate of Tom Burke, who now was on the lookout.

The gloomy reply of the old tar came grating harshly upon the ears of all the eager listeners.

"None! Nothing but hungry-looking sez-birds that's circling and circling round above me. God help us all, sir!"

Mary shuddered. The dusky Kanakas fell upon their faces, shricking madly; the Portuguese upon their knees, praying to their favorite saints.

Tamerlane alone stood in the center of the cave, apparently unmoved, indifferent.

"What life without love?" he muttered, more than once. "Who cares?"

Boong! cr-r-rash- -s vash! boom! boom! boom! came the seas above.

Burke suddenly descented half way down the ladder, as a great wall of water flew over the crater, sending a perfect torrent into the cave.

Night soon darkened round the submerged isle, and the light from the two lanterns, burning in the cell, streamed luvielly into the air. The gale had abated a little, but the water had now climbed more than half way up the conical rock.

There was no doubt that before morning it would be within an inch of the opening; orly one inch of rock between the castaways and eternity!

The people in the cave passed a miscrable night. The wild ravings of the Kanakas continued, and Mary heard her father cursed again and again by the islanders as a Jonah, at the cause of all their misfortunes.

Their wild eyes were turned up toward the opening, willed the Portuguese now ran hither and thither, alternately praying and howling like wild beasts.

Up rose Warlock, straight as a dart, with one arm so; porting Mary

"Hush!" he exclaimed, sternly. "I. we must die, let us die like men!"

This calmed the tumult a little, but when morning came, and Barke descended into the cave, with the information that the waves now rose within two inches of the opening, the clamor was recommenced.

Some of the men looked round them eagerly for a piece wood to which they might lash themselves, and then launch out, adrift upon the wide sea, as a last chance of being picked up. They looked in vain; all the wood, except the staff-pole, had been used for the formation of Brandon's raft, and not a chip was left.

"Men!" exclaimed Warlock, "we have remained here as long as there was a chance. But we must now leave this place, and trust ourselves to the sea, without support of any kind, except that afforded by our own arms. I believe you all can swim."

Punk, who had remained the very picture of abject terror, crouching in a corner, now rose, exclaiming that he was but me indifferent swimmer, and begging some person to take him in charge.

No heed was paid to him. One after the other emerged through the opening in the top of the cave, and threw himself into the sea, swimming away from the crater. Warlock, with Mary, was the last man, except the Tartar, who had not yet moved.

" (in," said the mate, pointing to the opening.
"You first," answered Tamerlane. "Go first."

Perceiving that he could not change the other's purpose, Warlock took his wife by the hand, and conducted ner up the labler. Just as he emerged through the opening, a fogback which for some time had obscured the water about a talk off, hing like a cartain, revealed the HULL AND SPARSOF A SHIP!

Those in the set also beliebl it, and set up a wild shout that rese to the very heavens, distinctly above the howling of the win i and the clashing of the waves.

Vaticing, her crew palling like mad.

Warrock waved his bandkerchief, to hurry them slong;

they came nearer every moment, finally picked up the swimmers, and, just as the water had risen to within half an inch of the crater, Mary was clasped to the bosom of her father, and Warlock was shaking hands with Captain Blake!

"Pull ahead!" howled the skipper. "There's danger here, loys, when the sea pours through that opening—a perfect whirlpool!"

The men laid to their oars with a will, and were but twenty fathoms from the crater, when through it the water rushed with the rumbling din of hollow thunder!

The gurgling and roaring continued for about ten minutes; then, a huge bubble rising as the cave was filled, marked for an instant the grave of the little island! The next moment the bubble burst, and no sign remained to show the location of the lost isle, over which the everlasting surges rolled, pooning on, as if nothing had happened. Explanations were soon finished, by which time the party were aboard ship. Tamerlane and Warlock both assisted Mary to mount to the deck, which she had scarcely reached when the hardships and excitement she had undergone, having proved too much for her, she fell senseless against the rail. Tamerlane sprung to seize her in his arms, but Warlock pushed him aside, interposing his own person.

Before either could touch the girl, Brandon, having been nearest to her, picked her up to convey her into the companionway.

"Dog !" exclaimed the Tartar, addressing himself to Warlock, "why you interfere?"

"Out of the way!" cried the mate, indignantly, pushing asile the young man who blocked his passage to the cabin.

The Tartar caught him by the throat; a fierce struggle ensued, which was ended by the mate dealing Tamerlane a blow upon the head which knocked him senseless. He lay upon the deck motionless, and for an instant all the spectators believed he had received his death blow.

"No, he lives! he lives!" exclaimed Dalton, the minister. patting his hand upon the heart of the prostrate man. "Loosen his shirt, so that he may breathe freely, and he will recover!"

The shirt was pulled away from the Tartar's chest, revealing shoullers and bosom of matchless proportions, and as white as snow.

Upon the left shoulder, Brandon—who, having seen his daughter revived, had now come up to look for Warlock, upon whose name she called—beheld an object that seemed to hold him spell-bound to the deck!

It was a BLUE ANCHOR, tattooed in India ink, beneath which were the letters W. C. !

A moment the second mate stood, gazing upon the mark; then, as the young man opened his eyes, and raised himself upon his elbow, the officer threw himself upon his knees by his side, clasping him in his arms and exclaiming:

"My son! my son! my long lost son! My little Will."
While the bewil lered crew crowded the quarter-deck, the captain pickel up something, which during his struggle the enough! It is the face of Brandon's wife, lost years ago!"

Brandon took the little miniature, and covered it with kisses. He had seen his wife hang it round Will's neck, just previous to the parting at the Sandwich Islands.

"Tell me! tell me, my boy!" he exclaimed, after he had made explanations to the Tartar: "tell me where she is—the original of this picture-your mother!"

"I know not," answered Will. "The old man who brought me up, and who never permitted me to know that I was not his own son, informed me when he gave me this miniature, that he had taken it from the neck of a woman, whom he found years before lying dead on the sea-beach, after a great storm."

fully. "Sie was killed, perhaps before, perhaps not until after being dashed up against the rocks, whither she was washed from the wreck; but her care of you, my boy, her care to the very last, was what goved your life! You were found by the old man, the Talkir. I see it all now, and were brought up by him as his own son, to be afterward made chief of his tribe!"

So saying, he led the young man into the cabin.

[&]quot;Embrace him, Mary. Warlock need not be jealous now the boy's influence over you and me is accounted for: embrace him, I say, he is your brother!"

Explanations were soon made, and brother and sister were folded in each other's arms.

"I told you," said the surprised and overjoyed bride, as she encircled her husband's neck, " I told you that this man's influence was nothing to trouble you-was far different from yours !"

"Ay!" exclaimed Biske, now entering. "Shake hands, Will, with your brother-in-law tor, in my opinion, it was the way in which he lashed you to the spar, on that terrible day aboard the storm-wrecked Griffin, that was the means of your life being saved!"

The two men cordially shook hands, and were sworn friends from that moment

Punk was so overjoyed at his safe delivery, and the singular discovery which had just been made aft, that he now commenced dancing a fandango, his long legs flying about like a windmill

Dalton, observing him, came forward, and in the faliness of his heart, tossed him a piece of money.

"Get more tobacco l" said he.

"Thank your honor! Shiver me! Ahoy there, ahoy. Whales off the lee binnacle! Stand to your guns, my hearties! Hooray! hooray! hooray!"

"Really," said Dalton, admiringly, as he moved his coattails up and down, "this is inspiring! Glory to God! for our gallant American tars!"

"Ay, glory it is! sure enough!" exclaimed old Burke, who, in spite of his superstitious belief that something would yet go wrong, as there was a Jonah concerned, could not my Lave worn a long face if it were to save his life.

There is little more to say.

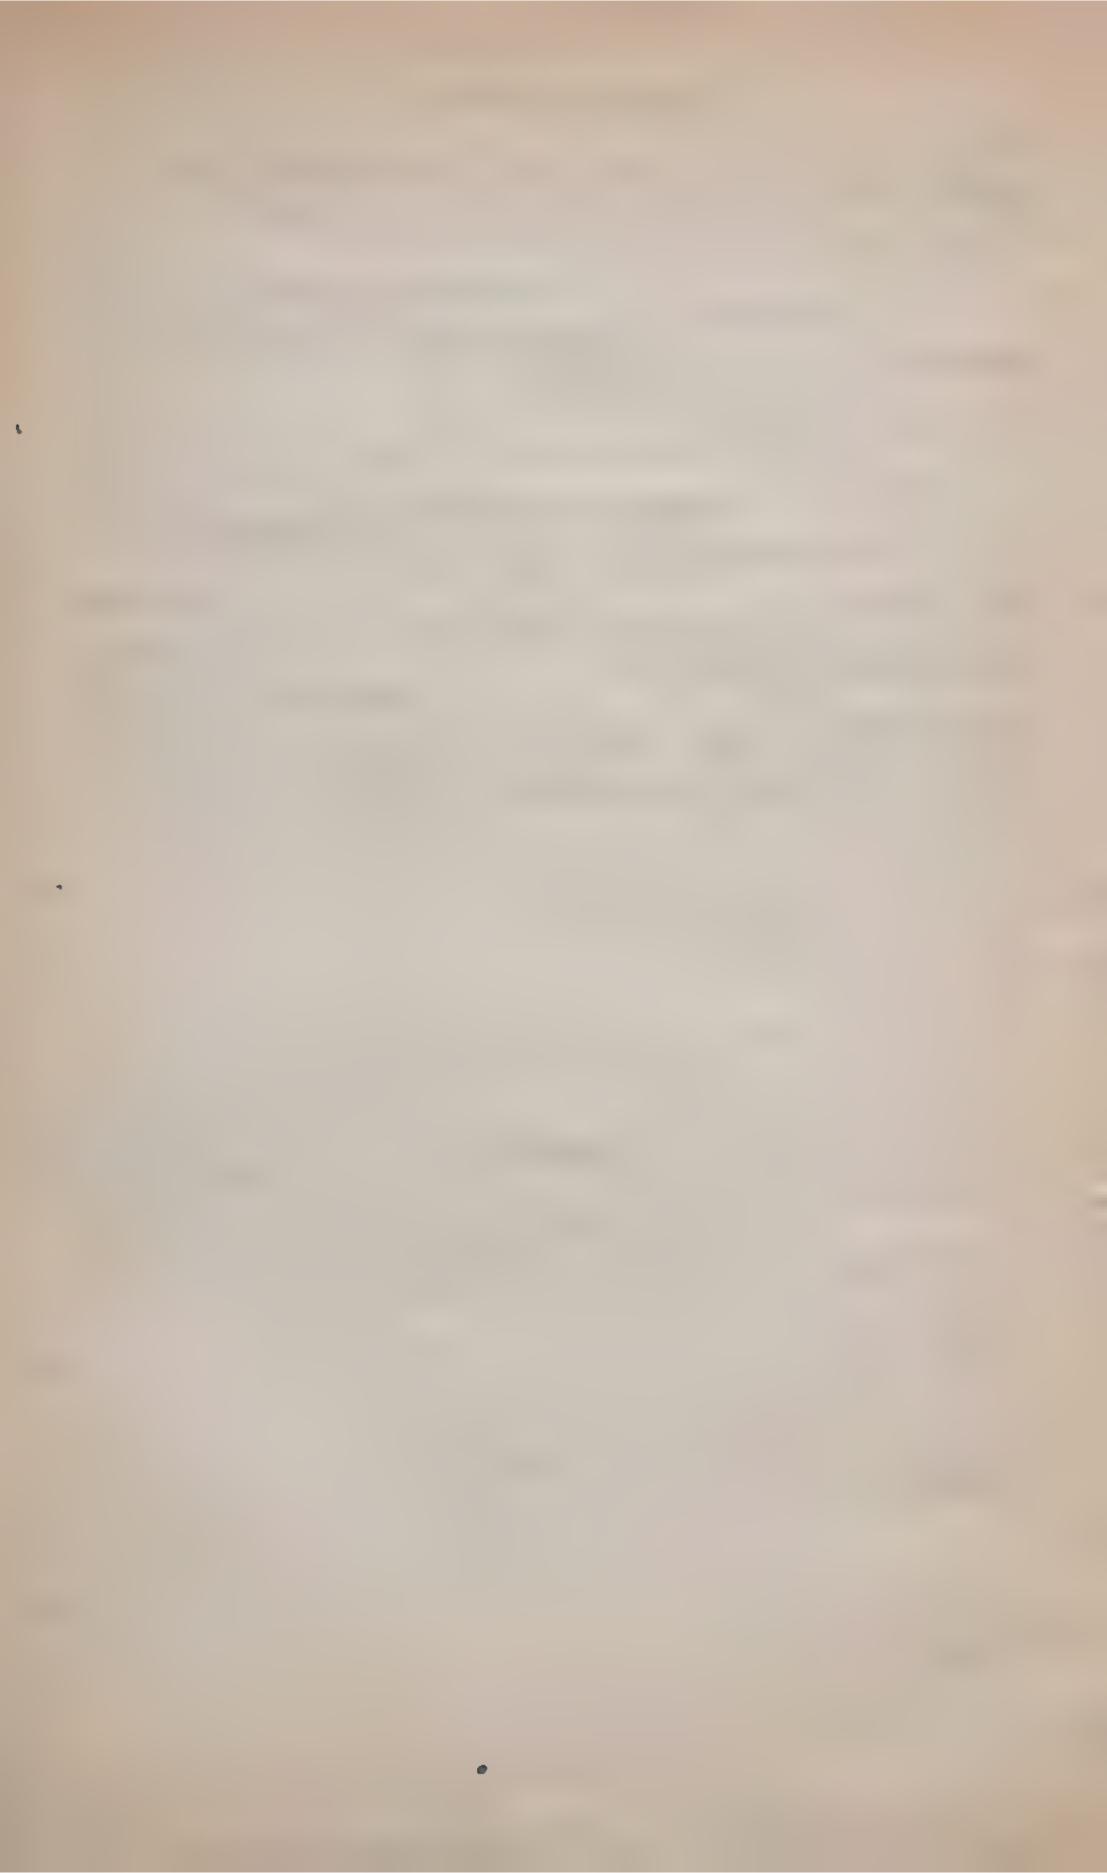

The Albatross, a week later, reached the Sandwich Islands tal proceeding north, after staying in port long enough to undergo thorough repairs, she met with good luck on the craising-grounds, and in six months was homeward bound, 3 fall ship; in due time she arrived safely, in New London harbor, when, with part of his share of the profits, Brandon purchased a neat little cottage, where he and his son now reside

Will has lost all his wild Tartar ways, and acquired an excellent English education. He will be married, I believe, is the course of a few months.

As to Warlock, and his beautiful bride, contentment smiles has sunshine upon their pleasant hearth-stone, in Flushing, Long Island. The happy husband is the owner of several fine vessels, engaged in the whaling-trade, and is doing very well. His wite has persuaded him to give up the sea, and take to farming; but, since his marriage, he has several times taid a visit to the Sandwich Islands and others of his old Pacific haunts.

He has three fine, healthy children, to whom, whenever Will Brandon visits his sister, he shows the BLUE ANCHOR up in his arm, and answers their many questions about that and the Lost bride. They never seem tired of hearing repeated this story, concerning their own mother.
